Freedom in the World 2023
Marking Fifty Years in the Struggle for Democracy

by Yana Gorokhovskaia, Adrian Shahbaz, and Amy Slipowitz

KEY FINDINGS

Global freedom declined for the 17th consecutive year. Moscow's war of aggression led to devastating human rights atrocities in Ukraine. New coups and other attempts to undermine representative government destabilized Burkina Faso, Tunisia, Peru, and Brazil. Previous years' coups and ongoing repression continued to diminish basic liberties in Guinea and constrain those in Turkey, Myanmar, and Thailand, among others. Two countries suffered downgrades in their overall freedom status: Peru moved from Free to Partly Free, and Burkina Faso moved from Partly Free to Not Free.

The struggle for democracy may be approaching a turning point. The gap between the number of countries that registered overall improvements in political rights and civil liberties and those that registered overall declines for 2022 was the narrowest it has ever been through 17 years of global deterioration. Thirty-four countries made improvements, and the tally of countries with declines, at 35, was the smallest recorded since the negative pattern began. The gains were driven by more competitive elections as well as a rollback of pandemic-related restrictions that had disproportionately affected freedom of assembly and freedom of movement. Two countries, Colombia and Lesotho, earned upgrades in their overall freedom status, moving from Partly Free to Free.

While authoritarians remain extremely dangerous, they are not unbeatable. The year's events showed that autocrats are far from infallible, and their errors provide openings for democratic forces. The effects of corruption and a focus on political control at the expense of competence exposed the limits of the authoritarian models offered by Beijing, Moscow, Caracas, or Tehran. Meanwhile, democratic alliances demonstrated solidarity and vigor.

Infringement on freedom of expression has long been a key driver of global democratic decline. Over the last 17 years, the number of countries and territories that receive a score of 0 out of 4 on the report's media freedom indicator has ballooned from 14 to 33, as journalists face persistent attacks from autocrats and their supporters while receiving inadequate protection from intimidation and violence even in some democracies. The past year brought more of the same, with media freedom coming under pressure in at least 157 countries and territories during 2022. Scores for a related indicator pertaining to freedom of personal expression have also declined over the years amid greater invasions of privacy, harassment and intimidation, and incentives to self-censor both online and offline.

The fight for freedom persists across decades. When Freedom House issued the first edition of its global survey in 1973, 44 of 148 countries were rated Free. Today, 84 of 195 countries are Free. Over the past 50 years, consolidated democracies have not only emerged from deeply repressive environments but also proven to be remarkably resilient in the face of new challenges. Although democratization has slowed and encountered setbacks, ordinary people around the world, including in Iran, China, and Cuba, continue to defend their rights against authoritarian encroachment.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The global struggle for democracy approached a possible turning point in 2022. The gap between the number of countries that registered overall improvements in political rights and civil liberties and those that registered overall declines was the narrowest it has ever been through 17 consecutive years of deterioration.

The most serious setbacks for freedom and democracy were the result of war, coups, and attacks on democratic institutions by illiberal incumbents. The authoritarian regime in Russia launched a full-scale invasion of Ukraine in a bid to scuttle that country's hard-won democratic progress. New coups and other attempts to undermine representative government destabilized Burkina Faso, Tunisia, Peru, and Brazil. Previous years' coups and ongoing repression continued to diminish basic liberties in Guinea and constrain those in settings such as Turkey, Myanmar, and Thailand. Afghanistan's Taliban regime barred girls from receiving an education in the midst of an ongoing economic and humanitarian crisis. Governments and occupying powers used violence and other means to destroy cultures and change the ethnic composition of populations in 21 countries and territories, including Ukraine, Ethiopia, and Myanmar.

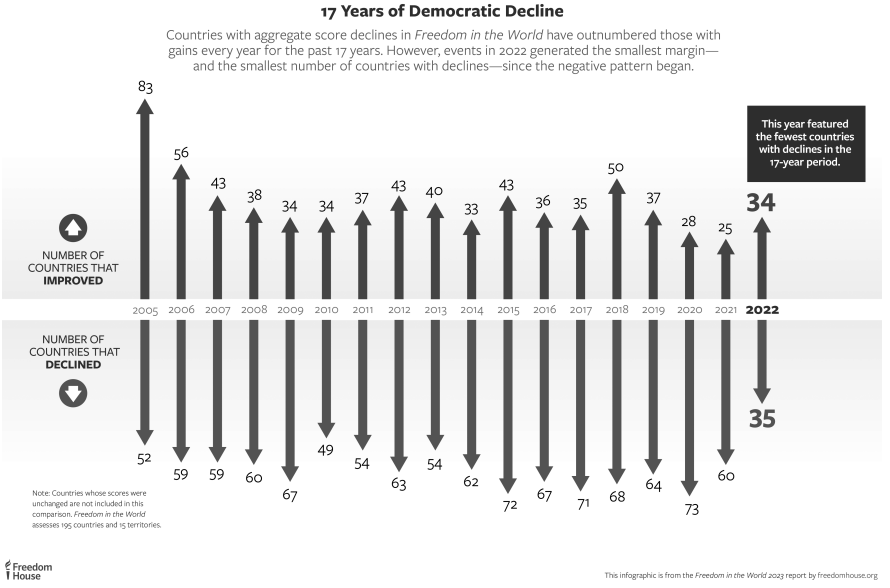
A total of 34 countries showed improvements in political rights and civil liberties, compared with 35 that lost ground, signaling a possible slowdown in the global decline. Democratic gains were achieved through more transparent and competitive elections in Lesotho, Colombia, and Kenya. A lifting of pandemic-related restrictions that disproportionately affected freedom of assembly and freedom of movement also produced positive change, as did a renewed commitment to judicial independence in some countries.

In addition to these outright improvements, the year brought fresh evidence of the limits of authoritarian power. Authoritarian influence at the United Nations and other international organizations faltered as democracies reaffirmed the value of multilateral engagement. Ukrainians, with material support from many democracies, beat back a vast Russian army that was hampered by decades of corruption. In China, the ruling Communist Party's onerous and politicized COVID-19 policies were abruptly dismantled in the face of public protests.

The 2023 edition of Freedom in the World is the 50th in this series of annual comparative reports. As such, it provides an opportunity to reflect on the challenges to and achievements of democracy over the past five decades. Among the more significant challenges has been a widespread assault on the civil liberties that can be used to hold governments to account—most notably, freedom of expression.

Over the last 17 years, the number of countries and territories that receive a score of 0 out of 4 on the report's media freedom indicator has ballooned from 14 to 33. The year 2022 brought more of the same, with media freedom coming under pressure in at least 157 countries and territories. Scores for a related indicator pertaining to freedom of personal expression have also suffered over the years amid greater invasions of privacy, harassment and intimidation, and incentives to self-censor both online and offline.

It has become more difficult to consolidate nascent democratic institutions in recent decades. More and more countries have remained Partly Free instead of moving toward full democratization. Still, the world is significantly freer today than it was 50 years ago. In 1973, 44 of 148 countries were rated Free. Today, 84 of 195 countries have earned that status. Many strong democracies that emerged during periods of progress have since withstood serious political, social, and economic pressures.



Ongoing protests against repression in Iran, Cuba, China, and other authoritarian countries suggest that people's desire for freedom is enduring, and that no setback should be regarded as permanent. Democratic societies' international solidarity, commitment to shared values, and continued support for human rights defenders are crucial to ensuring that the next 50 years bring the world closer to a state of freedom for all.

DIRECT ATTACKS ON DEMOCRACY AND THE HUMAN COST OF AUTHORITARIAN RULE

Dramatic declines in political rights and civil liberties during 2022 were driven by direct assaults on democratic institutions, whether by foreign military forces or incumbent officials in positions of trust. War, coups d'état, and power grabs repeatedly posed an existential threat to elected governments around the world.

In February, Ukrainians were violently thrust into the heart of the global struggle to defend democracy against authoritarianism. President Vladimir Putin of Russia, having already overseen the illegal occupation of Ukrainian territory in Crimea and eastern Donbas since 2014, launched a full-scale invasion of the country. Whatever false justifications for this war of aggression have been promulgated by the Kremlin's state-controlled media, its clear purpose is to remove the elected leadership in Kyiv and deprive Ukrainians of their fundamental right to free self-government.

The war has been, as Ukrainian president Volodymyr Zelenskyy put it, a disaster with a high price. In his desire to destroy democracy in Ukraine and deny Ukrainians their political rights and civil liberties, Putin has caused the deaths and injuries of thousands of Ukrainian civilians as well as soldiers on both sides, the destruction of crucial infrastructure, the displacement of millions of people from their homes, a proliferation of torture and sexual violence, and the intensification of already harsh repression within Russia.

Military coups

While the assault on Ukraine's democracy came from a neighboring state, a growing number of countries faced attacks from within. Burkina Faso experienced the steepest decline in freedom in this year's report, losing a total of 23 points on the 100-point scale and falling from Partly Free to Not Free status as a result of two successive coups. In January 2022, Lieutenant Colonel Paul-Henri Sandaogo Damiba, leading a self-proclaimed Patriotic Movement for Safeguard and Restoration, ousted the elected president, suspended the constitution, dissolved the legislature, and instituted a curfew. Just eight months later, he was replaced by another officer, Captain Ibrahim Traoré, who dismissed the transitional government, again suspended the constitution, closed the borders, and issued orders that prevented civil society organizations from operating. Both coup leaders ruled by decree and made only vague commitments to holding democratic elections in the future.

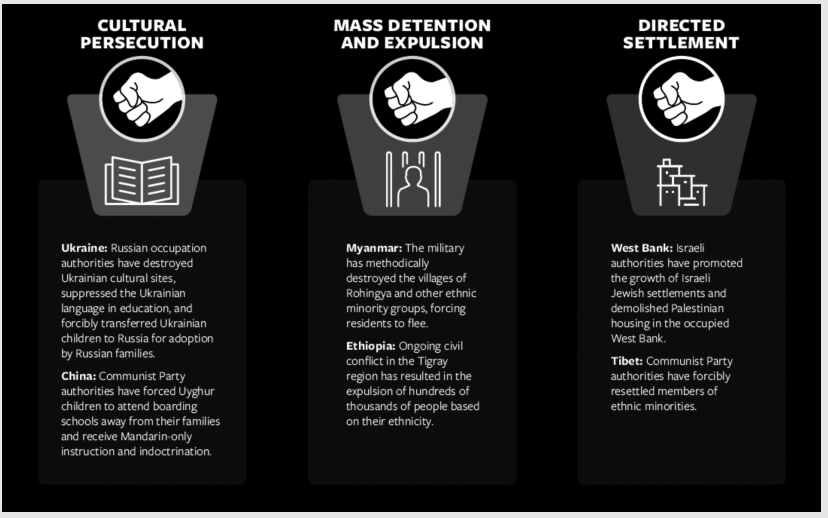
Events at the end of 2022 showed that even unsuccessful coup attempts can do immediate harm to the political system and human rights, especially when they take place in a country that has previously experienced authoritarianism. In December, Peru's President Pedro Castillo tried to avoid imminent impeachment by suspending Congress and declaring a nationwide curfew. Castillo's attempted "autogolpe," or self-coup, happened 30 years after President Alberto Fujimori seized legislative and judicial powers in the country with help from the military and began a decade-long dictatorship. Even though Castillo was quickly removed from office and replaced by the vice president, his arrest sparked large protests across the country and triggered the implementation of a state of emergency that granted special powers to security services and limited the right to assembly. Over two dozen people were killed and hundreds were injured in December alone as police responded to the protests with deadly force, and unrest continued into the new year. The crisis caused the country to drop from Free to Partly Free status and threatened to further undermine a political system that has endured multiple presidential resignations and impeachments in recent years.

In addition to the dangers they pose in the moment, coups and coup attempts can have repercussions that substantially degrade protections for human rights in the long run. Thailand's civil society continues to feel the effects of a 2014 coup by army chief Prayuth Chan-ocha. Perceived critics of the military-backed government face charges under lèse-majesté laws, which forbid insulting the monarchy, and human rights organizations were subjected to increasingly intense legal harassment in 2022. The ruling junta in Guinea, which came to power in a 2021 coup, has continued to roll back rights and reverse the democratic gains of the past decade, banning all political protests last year. Since a 2021 coup in Myanmar, the military junta there has waged a relentless and brutal campaign of violence across the country, detaining and killing thousands of people, displacing approximately one million residents, and destroying an experiment with elected civilian rule that the military itself had initiated with a new constitution in 2008.

In Turkey, a failed 2016 coup attempt has cast a long shadow over political rights and civil liberties. President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan and his Justice and Development Party (AKP) used the incident to justify the removal of key democratic checks and balances and the elimination of political rivals. This process continued in 2022, as Turkey prepared for a pivotal presidential election in the first half of 2023. Ahead of the vote, the government adopted a new law to control the selection of judges who will review challenges to election results, and approved a "disinformation" law that could further stifle opposition campaigns and independent media.

The threat from incumbent leaders

Democratic institutions suffered from abuses by powerful incumbents in 2022. After assuming office through elections, these leaders rejected the established democratic process and sought to rewrite the rules of the game to maintain their grip on power.



Tunisia experienced the third-largest score decline of any country as a direct result of the actions of the elected president. Kaïs Saïed, who had unilaterally dismissed the prime minister and suspended the parliament in 2021, continued to consolidate power by formally dissolving the parliament in March. He then rolled out a new constitution that gave more authority to the presidency and dismantled legislative and judicial checks on the executive branch, securing approval for the document through a flawed referendum. December parliamentary elections, which were boycotted by most opposition parties, drew a voter turnout of just 11 percent and prompted calls from the opposition for Saïed to resign.

In El Salvador, the parliamentary supermajority gained by President Nayib Bukele's allies in 2021 elections continued to help him undermine democratic controls. In March 2022, the legislature approved his request for a state of exception intended to address gang violence, which has led to the indefinite detention of tens of thousands of people, with little regard for their due process rights. Under the state of exception, authorities have also suspended anticorruption mechanisms that would shed light on government spending and contracts. In September, Bukele announced that he would compete for a second term, a year after the Constitutional Court—newly packed with his appointees after a wholesale purge—overturned a ban on consecutive presidential terms.

The victory of Prime Minister Viktor Orbán's Fidesz party in Hungary's April 2022 elections was facilitated by his government's campaign since 2010 to systematically undermine the independence of the judiciary, opposition groups, the media, and nongovernmental organizations. Among other advantages, Fidesz benefited from legislative changes it had pushed through two years earlier, which raised the vote threshold that parties must reach to enter the parliament.

CONTROLLING LAND BY CHANGING ITS PEOPLE

Governments and occupying powers in 21 countries and territories use a variety of methods to forcibly change the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance.

Brazilian president Jair Bolsonaro's warnings that he would not accept election results if he lost stoked mistrust in the democratic process among his supporters. After losing to Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva in a runoff, Bolsonaro avoided formally conceding, and his campaign later attempted to overturn the result in court by claiming that a computer error had disqualified large batches of votes. Just before Lula's January 1 inauguration, Bolsonaro traveled to the United States, avoiding participation in the traditional transfer of the presidential sash to the new leader. The next week, thousands of the former president's loyalists, who had repeatedly called for a military coup against the new government, stormed Congress, the Supreme Court, and the presidential palace. Although the elected administration retained power and cracked down on the perpetrators, Brazilian democracy remained on the defensive after this destructive event.

The worst excesses of unchecked power

When assessing the stakes of the struggle for democracy, it is important to remember the devastating costs that authoritarian rule can impose on entire populations. In the absence of any meaningful constraints on political power and the use of force, a growing number of regimes around the world have engaged in wholesale persecution of women or ethnic minority groups, in some cases drawing accusations of genocide.

Since overthrowing Afghanistan's elected government in 2021, the Taliban have presided over a catastrophic economic collapse, a surge in hunger and poverty, and mass emigration. Rather than taking steps that would reduce its international isolation, however, the regime has moved in the opposite direction. The Taliban authorities barred girls from attending secondary school in March 2022, effectively ending education for women after the sixth grade, and in December they ordered private and public universities to prohibit female students from attending classes, preventing women who already reached higher education from completing their studies. Also in December, authorities issued a decree banning women from working in national and international nongovernmental organizations. Lacking any recourse within the political system, Afghan women took their demands to the streets, where they were met with water cannons, beatings, and arrests.

The number of countries and territories where the government or an occupying power is deliberately changing the ethnic composition of the population in order to destroy a culture or tip the political balance increased from 19 to 21 last year. Ethiopia and Ukraine were added to the list, joining longtime sites of forced ethnic change like China and Myanmar.

In Ethiopia, the ongoing civil conflict centered on the northern Tigray region has resulted in, among other abuses, extrajudicial killings, enforced disappearances, and the expulsion of hundreds of thousands of people from their homes on the basis of their ethnicity. Like other countries and territories in the Not Free category, Ethiopia lacks many aspects of the rule of law that might protect its citizens' fundamental human rights.

Moscow's occupation of Crimea and eastern Donbas has entailed a long-standing campaign of forced ethnic change in those Ukrainian territories. Since 2014, many Crimean Tatars and ethnic Ukrainians have left the regions, driven not only by political persecution and the violence of war but also by overt policies of Russification, including encouragement of migration from Russia, transfers of local prisoners and conscripts to Russia, deportations of those who refuse Russian citizenship, and repression of the Ukrainian and Tatar cultures and languages within the education system. These practices were expanded to other parts of occupied Ukraine after the full-scale invasion, and augmented with horrific projects like the mass abduction and removal of Ukrainian children to Russia.

Forced ethnic change is also a matter of official policy for the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), which aims to deliberately break up the cultures and geographic concentrations of ethnic minority groups in Xinjiang, Tibet, and Inner Mongolia. Among the 57 Not Free countries in the world, China ranks near the absolute bottom in terms of overall political rights and civil liberties. It is joined there by Myanmar, where the military has engaged in violent attacks on and expulsions of the Rohingya population as well as several other ethnic groups.

A POSSIBLE TURNING POINT FOR GLOBAL FREEDOM

There were signs during the past year that the world's long freedom recession may be bottoming out, which would set the stage for a future recovery. The gap between the number of countries that registered overall improvements in political rights and civil liberties and those that registered overall declines in 2022 was the narrowest it has ever been through 17 consecutive years of deterioration. The number of countries with declines, at 35, was the smallest recorded since the negative pattern began. Thirty-four countries registered improvements.

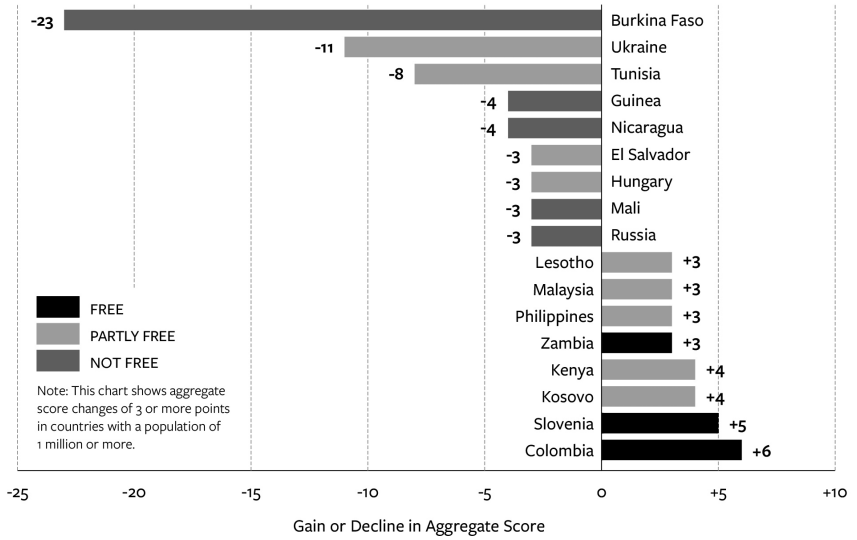
The gains came in various forms. Eight countries registered modest improvements in civil liberties due to the rollback of COVID-19 restrictions that had disproportionately infringed on the freedoms of assembly and movement. But the most significant positive developments were driven by competitive elections in Latin America and Africa, with politicians and ordinary people in the affected countries reaffirming their commitment to the democratic process.

The year also brought fresh evidence of the limits of authoritarian power, as key regimes faltered in their attempts to exert influence at international organizations and their internal governance flaws led to dramatic policy setbacks.

Consolidating democracy through elections

Two countries, Lesotho and Colombia, improved from Partly Free to Free last year following successful competitive elections. In Lesotho, Sam Matekane's Revolution for Prosperity party won a plurality of seats in the parliament and replaced the incumbent government. Representing a departure from years of instability, the elections were hailed as fair and peaceful by observers from numerous international organizations. In Colombia, a broad coalition enabled Gustavo Petro to win the June presidential runoff vote, overcoming political forces associated with former president Álvaro Uribe, who has dominated the political scene since the early 2000s. The country had been making gains in respect for fundamental rights even before the election period, as the government granted temporary protection permits to more Venezuelan refugees and the Constitutional Court decriminalized abortion.

Establishing a strong record of peaceful political competition and democratic power transfers can be a long and arduous process. The elections in both Colombia and Lesotho were not without problems, and obstacles to further progress remain. Lesotho continues to struggle with ills including police brutality, a legacy of political influence exercised by the security agencies, and chronic political turmoil. In Colombia, politicians faced threats of violence while on the campaign trail, and illegal armed groups associated with the far left and far right remain a menace to the rule of law and civil society. The country is one of the deadliest in the world for human rights defenders.



The United States navigated its 2022 midterm elections without any violence of the sort that occurred during the January 2021 assault on the Capitol. The elections produced a divided Congress, with the Republican Party winning a narrow majority in the House of Representatives while the Democratic Party maintained control in the Senate. Although hundreds of Republican candidates who explicitly denied the legitimacy of President Joseph Biden's victory over former president Donald Trump in the 2020 election ran for office across the country, they lost in almost all key statewide races. This comparative stability on the political front was offset by the Supreme Court's removal of constitutional protections against strict abortion bans.

In Slovenia, a competitive election with the highest voter turnout in 20 years resulted in defeat for the right-wing populist government, which had repeatedly threatened media freedom and other democratic norms. Kenya held what observers hailed as its most transparent presidential election ever, and the results were confirmed by an independent Supreme Court. The country's political leaders notably refrained from the boycotts and incitement of ethnic violence that had disrupted some previous elections.

LARGEST ONE-YEAR GAINS AND DECLINES IN 2022

Gains in aggregate score reflect improvements in conditions for political rights and civil liberties.

Checks on autocrats' international influence

Authoritarian powers have made an effort to reshape the international system by exercising their influence at the United Nations. They have embraced UN participation and multilateralism primarily as a means of defending themselves against international mechanisms aimed at transparency and accountability. Elected five times to the UN Human Rights Council, the Chinese government has repeatedly blocked resolutions addressing its own policies. It has also joined with its counterparts from Iran, Belarus, North Korea, Cuba, and other member states in the so-called Group of Friends in Defense of the Charter of the United Nations to criticize the use of sanctions.

Regional organizations too have been used to prop up autocrats. The Russian-controlled Collective Security Treaty Organization (CSTO), for example, deployed troops in January 2022 to protect Kazakhstan's President Kasym-Zhomart Tokayev from large-scale antigovernment protests sparked by a sharp rise in fuel prices.

However, authoritarian cooperation is motivated by narrow self-interest and centers on low-cost actions, meaning it can fracture when regimes' priorities diverge or they encounter determined democratic pressure. The CSTO's response to the crisis in Kazakhstan, for instance, stood in stark contrast to the organization's failure to assist Armenia, the only member state that is rated Partly Free, as it suffered repeated attacks on its sovereign territory by Azerbaijan.

Few of Vladimir Putin's authoritarian allies have openly supported his war of aggression against Ukraine. CCP leader Xi Jinping has not endorsed the invasion or provided military support despite describing the bilateral partnership as having "no limits" early in 2022. The countries of the Caucasus and Central Asia are often seen as lying within Moscow's geopolitical orbit, but Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan have declined to recognize Russia's annexation of Ukrainian territory, and they have all complied with sanctions against Russian banks. The Kremlin's most steadfast ally in the region continues to be President Alyaksandr Lukashenka of Belarus, who is dependent on Russian support to maintain his own tenuous grip on power.

Meanwhile, democracies are standing up for human rights at international organizations. After years of being shielded by diplomats from Russia and China, Myanmar's junta was condemned by the UN Security Council in December for using violent tactics against prodemocracy activists. Similarly, despite the presence of authoritarian member states, the UN Human Rights Council voted to suspend Russia in April. In October, the council went further, appointing a special rapporteur to monitor the human rights situation in Russia by a vote of 17 to 6.

Venezuela was denied a seat on the UN Human Rights Council in October elections by the General Assembly. While most regional groups did not nominate more candidate countries than available seats, democratic Costa Rica and Chile both ran to block Venezuela's bid for a seat from the Latin America and Caribbean group. In December, Iran was removed from the UN Commission on the Status of Women and prevented from serving the rest of its four-year term as a result of a resolution introduced by the United States and supported by 28 other countries. The measure noted that the Iranian government's campaign to suppress the rights of women and girls by using force against protesters flew in the face of the UN body's mission to promote gender equality.

The contest between democratic and authoritarian norms at international organizations is far from over. But the positive developments of the past year should encourage even more active democratic engagement in multilateral forums.

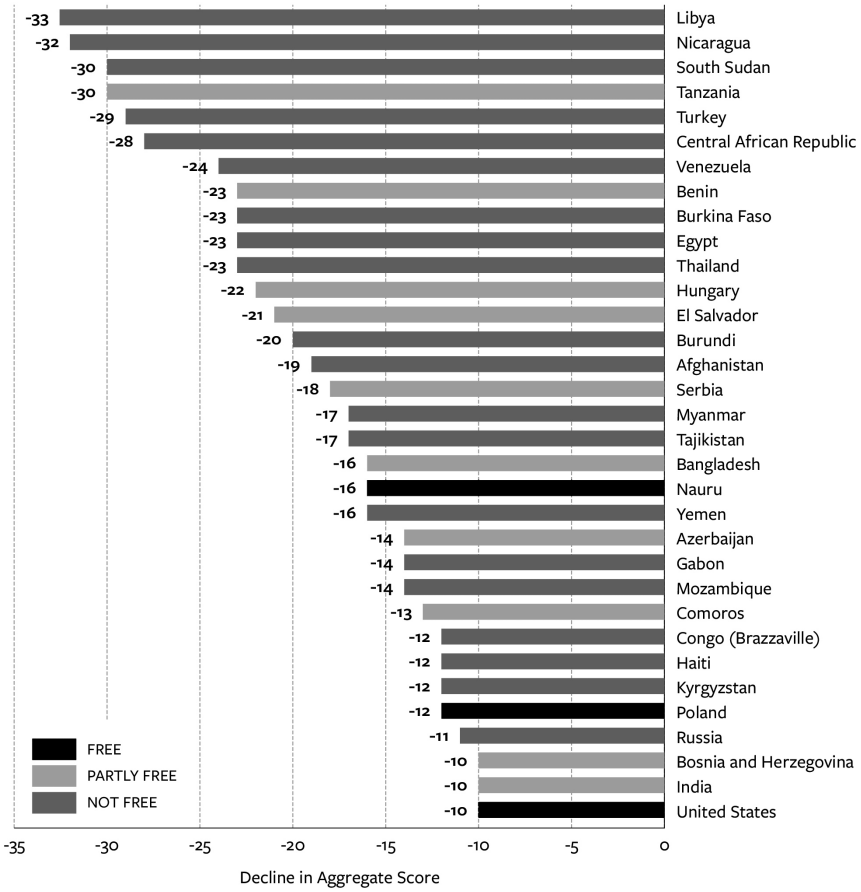
Control over competence

Autocrats' behavior at the international level is a reflection of their governing methods at home, where in the absence of a genuine popular mandate, they rely on a crude combination of corruption and force to maintain control. The democratic institutions that might moderate graft and state violence—such as opposition parties, independent courts, a free press, and civil society groups—are suppressed as potential threats to the leader's power. When such corrosive problems are allowed to go unchecked, they can undermine the regime's own goals and threaten the lives of ordinary people.

Corruption comes at a high cost to both public services and government revenue. In Venezuela, endemic corruption orchestrated by the regime of Nicolás Maduro has stripped the land of natural resources and undermined crucial infrastructure, impoverishing the population and impeding the government's ability to address health and economic emergencies. The country consequently faces an ongoing humanitarian crisis, with shortages of electricity, medicine, and food. Over seven million people have fled abroad.

In Russia, Putin's long history of enabling corruption at the highest levels has left him unable to fulfill the goals of his war of aggression. Despite the fact that the Kremlin spent hundreds of billions of dollars on modernizing the Russian military over the last two decades, it remains a poorly equipped force, with soldiers who lack food and basic medical supplies and use Soviet-era maps and weapons. Many in the United States and elsewhere believed Putin's boasts that Russian military capabilities matched those of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and far outmatched those of Ukraine, but the progress of the war quickly disproved those claims. The families of Russian conscripts are now being asked to provide them with everything from body armor to gauze for bandages. None of this has stopped the Kremlin from sending such soldiers to their deaths as the war grinds on, since admitting defeat would threaten the illusion of strength and shrewdness on which Putin's illegitimate authority partly depends.

As with corruption, the need to maintain control through overwhelming force—and the lack of mechanisms to moderate it—can interfere with an autocrat's ability to adjust policy in response to public frustrations. China's disastrous experience with the CCP's "zero COVID" policy illustrated what can happen to people caught in an authoritarian system that is more focused on compelling their obedience than ensuring their well-being.



President Xi, who has been in power since 2012 and secured a third term as CCP leader in October 2022, has repeatedly claimed that China's political system is superior to democracy in providing stability, prosperity, and even protection from the spread of COVID-19. In dealing with the health threat, CCP officials leaned on existing tools of repression, expanded the use of surveillance technologies, and imposed mass quarantines on whole cities that disproportionately restricted freedom of movement and often threatened access to food and medical care. In December 2022, the CCP abruptly abandoned zero-COVID restrictions without adequate preparation. At the end of the month, reports emerged of overwhelmed hospitals and as many as 1 million new infections per day.

The about-face was triggered in part by nationwide protests that followed a deadly residential fire in Urumqi in late November, in which both victims and rescuers were reportedly hampered by COVID-related restrictions on movement. As Freedom House's China Dissent Monitor has shown, protests in China on a variety of issues are not uncommon. Despite the likelihood of grave punishments, citizens participated in 638 demonstrations and similar dissent events between June and September 2022. The zero-COVID protests in the wake of the Urumqi blaze were preceded by other acts of defiance, including the "bridge man" protest against the central government in Beijing in October. But even in the face of clear public outrage on a national scale, the CCP remains unable to address people's underlying grievances. It failed to make health restrictions more tailored or humane, or to lift them with appropriate caution. Indeed the party provoked further anger by promoting officials who were responsible for some of the greatest suffering, including Li Qiang, who had overseen harsh lockdowns as party chief in Shanghai.

The policy blunders committed by Moscow and Beijing demonstrate that the fallibility of authoritarian governments, and not just their malice, can take an incredibly large toll on human life. Corruption, criminality, and feckless leadership have made the Russian army far more deadly to soldiers and civilians on both sides of the front line, despite the force's failure to achieve stated war aims. Similarly, the Chinese government's botched reversal of its procrustean COVID-19 policies may prove even more destructive than the years of brutal lockdowns themselves. Authoritarian shortcomings must be assessed with clear eyes. These regimes are unlikely to govern more effectively than democracies, but their errors are part of what makes them so dangerous.

LARGEST 10-YEAR DECLINES

Dramatic declines in freedom have been observed in every region of the world.

FREE EXPRESSION: A LEADING INDICATOR OF DEMOCRATIC DECLINE

Freedom of expression, a fundamental component of democracy, has been under sustained attack around the world for the last 17 years. Of all the indicators that Freedom in the World uses to assess political rights and civil liberties, freedom of the media and freedom of personal expression have declined the most precipitously since 2005. This assault coincided with the rapid uptake of information and communication technologies that have effectively broken many states' media monopolies. In too many places, however, authorities responded to new forms of online expression with harsh offline punishments and technological innovations of their own.

Press freedom in retreat

Freedom for independent journalism has plummeted. The number of countries and territories that have a score of 0 out of 4 on the media freedom indicator has ballooned from 14 to 33 during the 17 years of global democratic decline, as journalists faced persistent attacks from autocrats and their supporters while receiving inadequate protection from intimidation and violence even in some democracies. The past year brought more of the same, with media freedom coming under pressure in at least 157 countries and territories assessed by Freedom in the World.

In Russia, a multiyear media crackdown went into overdrive as the government sought to eliminate domestic opposition to the full-scale invasion of Ukraine. Russian independent journalists and outlets had long contended with laws that labeled them as foreign agents, extremists, or "undesirable." In 2022, the expansion of criminal laws targeting the spread of false information related to the war empowered Roskomnadzor, the federal media and telecommunications regulator, to block websites more aggressively without a court order. Authorities blocked access to most of the independent media outlets that were still available in the country, including Ekho Moskvy, Dozhd, Voice of America, the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), and Meduza. Some foreign journalists were also denied entry to Russia.

Moscow's tactics have spread to Central Asia, where Kyrgyzstan has adopted many similar laws targeting the media. Kyrgyz authorities recently tried and failed to convict a prominent investigative journalist, Bolot Temirov, on dubious charges of forgery. In an outrageous violation of the rule of law, Temirov was summarily stripped of his citizenship and transported to Russia in late November 2022, despite the fact that he had been born in Kyrgyzstan.

Journalists routinely face harassment and threats in reprisal for their efforts to expose corruption. Two reporters, including a Cable News Network (CNN) correspondent, fled Guatemala last year after they received explicit threats, while another was arrested by the government in July. José Rubén Zamora, director of the newspaper El Periódico, which has faced severe harassment in the past, was charged with financial crimes in what many observers describe as a bid to censor an outlet that has reported critically on the government of President Alejandro Giammattei. Zamora remained in pretrial detention through the end of the year, with the trial reportedly not scheduled to start until May 2023.

Authorities in a variety of countries failed to offer effective protections to media professionals who were at risk of extralegal violence from nonstate actors. Journalists reporting on the security situation in Haiti, which had worsened since the 2021 assassination of President Jovenel Moïse, experienced an extraordinary amount of physical violence in 2022. Members of the media were executed by gangs, killed while in police custody, and shot at while on their way to work.

The risks of personal expression

Beyond the news media, ordinary people are less free to express their views to others, whether online or off. Many governments have been quick to reapply existing repressive laws to the online sphere and adopt invasive technologies to monitor digital communication. Others continue to resort to old-fashioned methods of control over speech, like the use of human informants and physical searches. The result is a pervasive sense of fear among civic activists, members of marginalized communities, and average citizens when discussing sensitive topics in public, semipublic, or private settings.

From 2005 to 2022, the number of countries and territories that scored a 0 out of 4 on this indicator rose from six to 15, signaling a nearly complete lack of freedom to voice antigovernment opinions even in private. In Nicaragua, years of worsening crackdowns on opposition to the regime of President Daniel Ortega culminated in show trials of dozens of people—accused of crimes ranging from treason to spreading false news and undermining national integrity—based almost solely on evidence that they made critical remarks about the government. Such cases clearly discourage others from speaking out. Conditions are at least as grim in Afghanistan, Belarus, Russian-occupied eastern Donbas, and Eritrea, where authorities have deployed networks of informants and checked people's phones to suppress the sharing of dissenting opinions.

The penalties for nonviolent criticism can be extreme. Myanmar's military junta executed prodemocracy activist Kyaw Min Yu, better known as Ko Jimmy, for speaking out against the 2021 military coup that displaced an elected civilian government. In August 2022, a terrorism court in Saudi Arabia sentenced Nourah bint Saeed al-Qahtani to 45 years in prison merely for social media posts, just weeks after handing a 34-year sentence to another woman, Salma al-Shehab, for sharing posts by Saudi dissidents. In Hong Kong, following Beijing's imposition of the draconian National Security Law in 2020, authorities began pursuing national security and sedition charges against both political activists and ordinary residents for expressing dissent, for example by playing protest songs, clapping in court, or putting up posters.

There are fewer and fewer spaces where people can express themselves without fear of surveillance. At a time when the internet has become fundamental to people's daily lives, virtually all online activities generate data that are subject to monitoring by authorities, whether directly or through commercial systems and advertising technology that can be exploited to reveal sensitive information. Many countries employ police units to search social media posts for banned forms of political, artistic, religious, or sexual expression. Networks of street cameras equipped with artificial intelligence can identify protesters and track their whereabouts. And the proliferation of spyware has made electronic surveillance potentially ubiquitous; even the presence of an internet-connected device can be enough to deter uninhibited discussion.

No country can match the scale and sophistication of China's surveillance state, in which residents' activities are invasively monitored by public security cameras, urban grid managers, and automated systems that detect suspicious and banned behavior, including innocuous expressions of ethnic and religious identity. Workers at private digital platforms in China are required to censor an ever-changing list of prohibited terms and to notify authorities about users who dare to criticize the CCP. Those identified as dissidents can face consequences including forced disappearance and torture.

But surveillance has also chilled freedom of expression in countries rated Free and Partly Free. Technology companies are generally required to maintain a log of their users' online activities, and in many countries, they must share it with authorities through a process that lacks judicial oversight and guardrails against abuse. The growing and unregulated global market for commercial spyware has enabled infringements on the right to private expression that often stretch across international borders. Rather than collecting data or intercepting traffic at fixed points in the telecommunications infrastructure, spyware targets a victim's smartphone or other electronic device regardless of its location, and allows the capture of phone records, contact lists, geolocation data, keyboard strokes, and even camera and microphone inputs. The Pegasus spyware product has been found on devices in France, Hungary, India, Israel, Mexico, and Poland. Victims included journalists and politicians, while the perpetrators remained unknown and unaccountable for their abuses.

These pernicious encroachments on freedom of expression pose an obvious threat to democracy. While professional journalists and media outlets disseminate information, ensure transparency, and hold the powerful to account, the freedom of personal expression reinforces individual autonomy and facilitates discussion of differing opinions. It is also crucial to fostering associations and communities within a larger society, including those based on ethnic, cultural, sexual, gender, and religious identities. The denial of press freedom and freedom of personal expression bolsters authoritarian control by cutting citizens off from accurate information and, just as importantly, from one another.

LESSONS FROM 50 YEARS OF FREEDOM IN THE WORLD

Over the past five decades, people in every region of the world have demanded and built democracies even under extremely difficult circumstances. Once fully established, most democratic systems have stood strong against a wide array of challenges.

In 1973, when Freedom House published its first comprehensive assessment of political rights and civil liberties, only 44 of 148 countries were classified as Free. Today, 84 of 195 countries are Free. The varied paths that these countries followed show there is no single method for improving or protecting political rights and civil liberties. However, popular self-government through credible, competitive, free, and fair elections continues to be the hallmark of democracy and a guarantee of its associated benefits.

A record of progress

The first editions of Freedom in the World coincided with the beginning of the "third wave" of democratization, when many military dictatorships were giving way to elected civilian leaders. A military junta in Greece collapsed in 1974 amid a confrontation with Turkey over control of Cyprus. Greek democracy was restored through general elections that were held just 142 days after the beginning of the crisis.

After right-wing dictator Francisco Franco died in 1975, Spain began its own transition to democracy, which took years and required overcoming the commitment of the armed forces to the old regime. The transition was confirmed through a free general election in 1977 and the adoption of a new constitution the following year. Spain's democracy proved resilient in the early 1980s, when the government survived a coup attempt and a second general election resulted in a peaceful transfer of power to the socialist opposition.

Positive change followed in Latin America. After a disastrous invasion of the Falkland Islands in 1982, the military leaders who had presided over Argentina's "dirty war"—a bloody campaign of state terrorism against political dissidents—finally stepped down, allowing for a general election that returned the country to civilian rule. Democracy also returned to Brazil after the military, which had begun to oversee gradual political liberalization, lost control in the 1985 elections. A military regime that caused Uruguay to be called "the torture chamber of Latin America" faltered after a failed attempt to reform the constitution in 1980, and ended with elections four years later. Augusto Pinochet's military dictatorship in Chile also came to an end through the power of the ballot box when referendum voters rejected a proposal to give the general eight more years in office.

THE EBB AND FLOW OF DEMOCRATIZATION

The share of countries rated Free has generally increased over the past 50 years, but progress faltered beginning in the early 2000s.

In the 1990s, Taiwan cemented a status of Free after holding its first direct presidential election, having previously ended 38 years of martial law in 1988 and instituted full multiparty legislative elections a few years later. In 1992, South Korea elected its first civilian president since 1961. South Africa, which was rated Free for the first time in the 1994–95 edition of Freedom in the World, broke from a violent and entrenched system of racist hierarchy in order to create the conditions for an inclusive, free, and fair election. The balloting resulted in the elevation of Nelson Mandela to the presidency and the formation of a new government of national unity.

The fall of the Iron Curtain in 1989 and of the Soviet Union itself in 1991 eventually brought freedom to a host of Central and Eastern European states, many of which sought closer ties to their fellow democracies in Western Europe. In 2004 alone, Czechia, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Slovakia, and Slovenia all joined the European Union, with Romania and Bulgaria following in 2007.

Despite pressure from illiberal forces since the mid-2000s, the gains of the third wave of democratization have mostly held. Consolidated democracies, where political rights and civil liberties have been secured, continue to endure in a dangerous world.

Setbacks and slowdowns

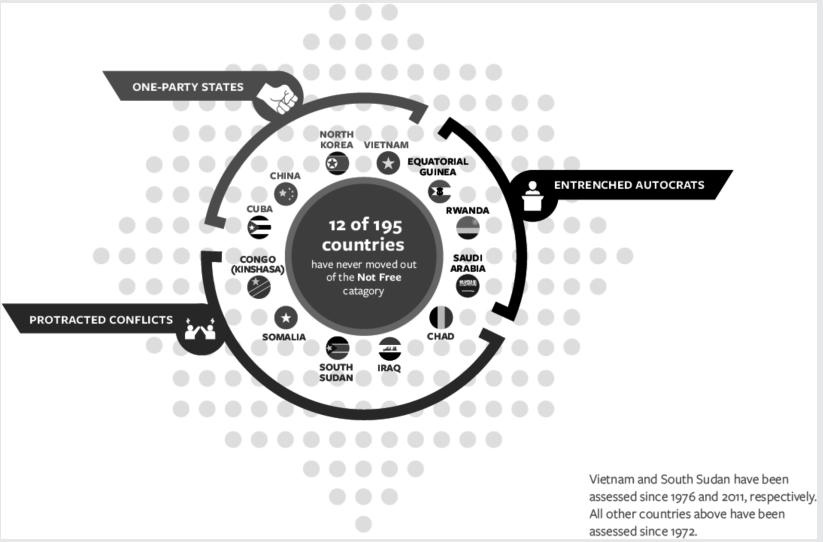
The 50 years of data generated by Freedom in the World offer heartening proof that democratic progress is always possible. Forty countries that exist today have always had the status of Free in the report, while only 12 countries that exist today have always been Not Free. Whereas Free countries tend to stay Free for decades, Not Free and Partly Free countries are less static, often experiencing waves of liberalization or repression that move them from one category to another.



However, the possibility of progress does not make it inevitable. The overall decline in global freedom over the last two decades has created a more hostile environment for individual countries' democratization efforts and provided transnational support for illiberal leaders. Freedom in the World data show that consolidating and protecting nascent democratic institutions has become more difficult than in the heyday of democratization following the end of the Cold War. More and more countries are remaining Partly Free instead of continuing their march to Free status. Worryingly, some Free countries are losing ground, including India, which was downgraded to Partly Free two years ago, and Peru, which was downgraded in this edition after its latest, one-year stint in the Free category.

Democratization has also failed to take hold in certain clusters of countries. Most of the states that emerged from the collapse of the Soviet Union remain dominated by strongmen who transformed Soviet-era connections into kleptocratic networks, which have enriched their members while impoverishing ordinary citizens. These corrupt authoritarian regimes have also fomented instability and threatened democracies across the region. In addition to Moscow's war against Ukraine, other recent conflicts include border clashes between Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan and the growing incursions by Azerbaijani forces into Armenia.

The Arab Spring uprisings of 2011, which began by driving out Tunisian dictator Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali and sparked new hope for democratization in North Africa and the Middle East, ended in disappointment. Monarchs in Jordan and Morocco approved modest or illusory constitutional reforms in a bid to defuse popular discontent with their rule, while the hereditary rulers of the wealthy Persian Gulf region moved to stamp out any embers of dissent at home and assist authoritarian partners elsewhere. Security forces cracked down on prodemocracy protesters in Libya, Syria, and Yemen, and the ensuing violence devolved into civil wars that were made even more chaotic by multiple foreign interventions. Two years after the revolution in Egypt, the military removed the elected president through a coup, and instituted a new and even more repressive authoritarian regime.

STILL WAITING FOR A CHANCE AT FREEDOM

Most of the countries now rated Not Free have spent at least some time in the Partly Free band over the past 50 years, but these 12 holdouts have never left the Not Free category since their first Freedom in the World analysis.

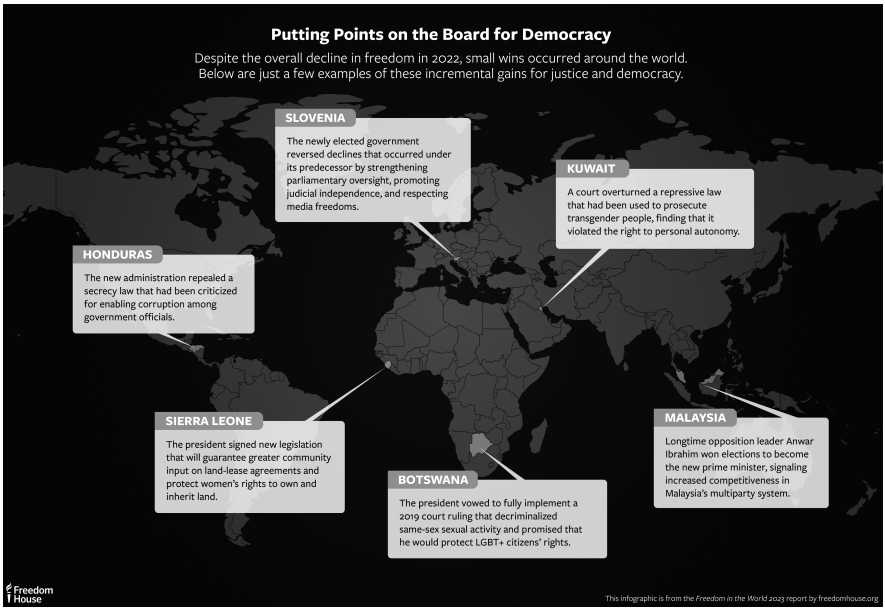
In Africa, countries such as Burundi, the Republic of the Congo, Zimbabwe, and Uganda showed promise at times but later saw their status improvements reversed, while more recent backsliding in Benin and Senegal led both to drop from Free to Partly Free status. Mali, which had been rated Free since 1995, was rocked by a military coup and rebel insurgencies in 2012 that pulled it down to Not Free.

The imperative of solidarity

Democracies must maintain external pressure on authoritarian regimes and make sure that in maneuvering to thwart one dictator's acts of aggression, they do not cultivate partnerships with other despots or downplay human rights principles in their foreign policies. International solidarity and support will remain vital to the expansion of political rights and civil liberties worldwide.

Advocacy for human rights norms must also be paired with support for the key proponents of democratic values within their respective countries: human rights defenders. Today, in every region of the world, people striving to build more democratic societies and expand the exercise of fundamental freedoms are instead being subjected to arbitrary detention and sentenced to lengthy terms in prison, where they often experience torture and other cruel or degrading treatment.



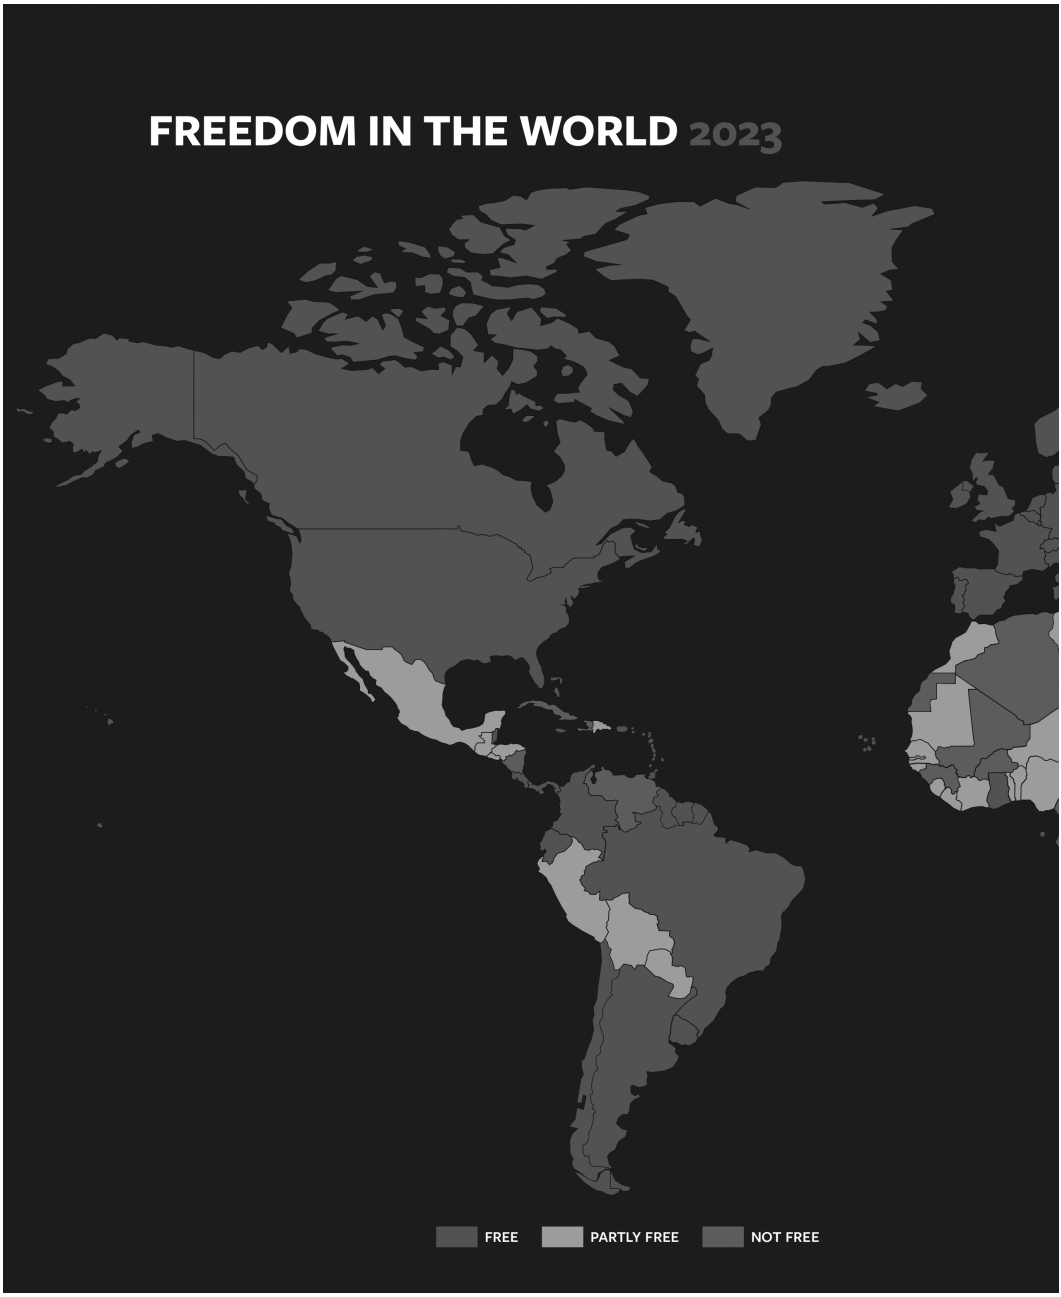
Supporting the work of human rights defenders is essential for the promotion of freedom in both open and closed political spaces. Human rights defenders are agents of change. In 2022, for instance, the Indonesian parliament passed a law against sexual violence after a years-long advocacy campaign by civil society groups. The previous year, women's rights activists in El Salvador secured a favorable ruling at the Inter-American Court of Human Rights against the country's broad ban on abortion.

Human rights defenders are sometimes the only ones in their countries with the will and capacity to protect others against severe abuses, expose official wrongdoing, and alert the rest of the world to acts of repression, often at considerable risk to their safety. Activists in Cameroon have received death threats for documenting human rights violations amid a conflict between security forces and separatists in the country's Anglophone regions. An activist and journalist in Vietnam who helped to expose the disastrous impact of a 2016 chemical spill was sentenced to seven years in prison the following year. In addition to facing intimidation, legal censure, harassment, and physical assaults, hundreds of rights defenders are killed every year.

Democratic governments must recommit not only to standing up for these activists in their public statements and diplomacy, but also to providing concrete support and protection in the form of emergency assistance, capacity-building programs, and democracy shelters. Though unarmed, human rights defenders are on the front lines of the global struggle for freedom. They should never be treated as if the struggle is theirs alone.

The desire for freedom

More than anything else, five decades of Freedom in the World reports demonstrate that the demand for freedom is universal. The years have shown that popular challenges to authoritarian rule are a recurring theme in even the most repressive societies.



Tanks smashed the prodemocracy movement that made its stand in Beijing's Tiananmen Square in 1989, and the CCP's fear of renewed calls for freedom has motivated escalating campaigns of repression against targets including mainland dissidents, ethnic and religious minority populations, and the people of Hong Kong. But Beijing's rejection of direct executive elections in Hong Kong in 2014 led to a series of massive protests that signaled abiding public support for universal suffrage. And despite crackdowns on demonstrations large and small, protests of all types continue across the mainland.

Cuba, with its long history of repression and international isolation, has been shaken by growing resistance to the regime. Demonstrations in July 2021 that drew attention to a dearth of fundamental freedoms and serious economic problems marked the largest antigovernment mobilization since the Maleconazo protests of 1994, which were sparked by police blocking Cubans from fleeing the country by boat. In both cases, security forces responded violently, yet outbreaks of dissent continue. People took to the streets again in 2022 to protest mismanaged infrastructure in the wake of hurricane-related blackouts.

Recent events in Iran are another reminder that millions of people are willing to call for democracy and defend their rights even at great personal risk. The current regime itself took power after popular protests brought down the monarchy in 1979, and Iranians have repeatedly voiced their objections over the years as it descended deeper into dictatorship. In 2009, shortly before the Arab Spring, citizens protested for the better part of a year in what came to be known as the Green Movement, after a fraudulent election handed victory to incumbent president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Conditions have worsened since then, with authorities using lethal violence to put down successive waves of protests. In 2022, fresh demonstrations were sparked by the death in custody of Jina Mahsa Amini, a young woman arrested by the morality police. The movement spread to more than 80 cities and was viciously opposed by the government, resulting in hundreds of deaths on the streets, thousands of arrests, and a growing number of summary executions.

Reflecting on the 1979 Iranian Revolution, Raymond Gastil wrote in the 1980 edition of the Freedom in the World report: "Iran will remain for generations a difficult land in which to institutionalize democracy. Yet I suggest Iranians will repeatedly try, that they will be unsatisfied with anything else. . . . If the Revolution establishes a new tyranny, these people will soon feel cheated and strive again for freedom." This prediction has certainly proven true for Iranians, and the same could be said for people everywhere. So long as human beings remain true to their natural yearning for liberty, authoritarians will never be secure, and the global movement for democracy will never be defeated.

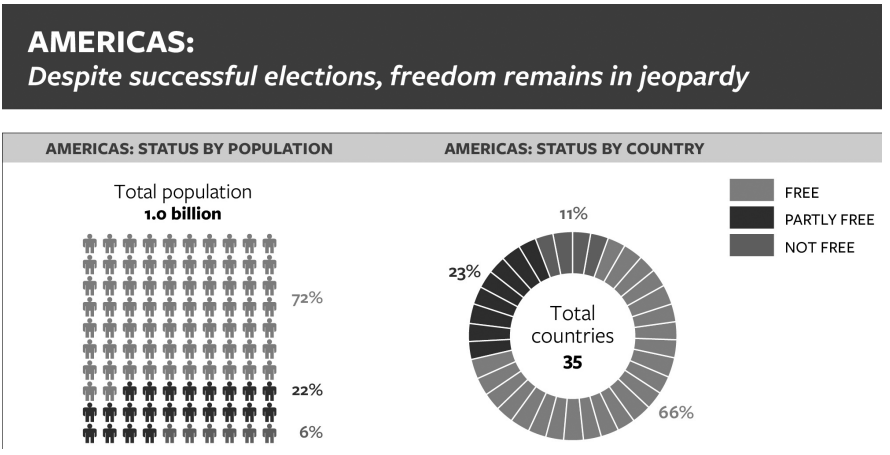
Transfers of power, for better or worse

AFRICA:
Transfers of power, for better or worse

Changes in leadership were a major tension point in Africa over the past year. Chronic problems such as corruption and misgovernance, combined with the economic impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic and the war in Ukraine, have left African states more vulnerable to irregular seizures of power by military or executive officials. Despite these threats, however, several countries held free and fair elections that ushered in new governments and reinforced democratic institutions.

In Burkina Faso, the year's two military coups eliminated many of the gains from a 2014 political transition, sidelined electoral bodies and accountability mechanisms, and exacerbated a security crisis in which Islamist militant activity has displaced millions of people. But the country is not an outlier in the region: coup attempts were also made during 2022 in Guinea-Bissau, The Gambia, and São Tomé and Príncipe.

Past coups have had lasting repercussions for political rights and civil liberties. In Guinea, the military junta that took control in 2021 has delayed a planned return to civilian rule until January 2025, incarcerated its critics, and brutally repressed street protests. Similarly, in the wake of Mali's 2021 coup, the military authorities scrapped elections that had been scheduled for February 2022. Under international pressure, they announced a transition plan that would culminate in a presidential vote in 2024. Tunisian president Kaïs Saïed, who had asserted extraordinary powers and suspended the parliament in 2021, pressed ahead with his unilateral overhaul of the political system, mounting a flawed constitutional referendum and parliamentary elections that were boycotted by the opposition and the vast majority of eligible voters.



Other power transfers have been far more democratic. Kenya's election featured increased transparency, fresh evidence of judicial independence, and a peaceful handover of the presidency from one political bloc to another. The process represented a stark improvement over previous balloting, which has repeatedly been marred by ethnic violence, electoral misconduct, and politicians' refusal to accept defeat. In Lesotho, a newly established party secured a legitimate victory in general elections, and Zambia's successful rotation of power through elections in 2021 led to some progress in the fight against corruption, greater transparency and access to information, and fewer restrictions on freedom of assembly in 2022.

Countries with a record of respecting term limits and ensuring orderly presidential succession exhibited notable signs of good governance during the year. In Botswana, President Mokgweetsi Masisi held a historic meeting with representatives of a leading LGBT+ rights organization and promised to work toward decriminalizing same-sex relations. Liberia's government implemented new initiatives to counter human trafficking, which have led to successful prosecutions. And under President Samia Suluhu Hassan in Tanzania, civil society groups enjoyed somewhat more space to operate after a period of intense repression under the previous administration. These examples underscore the potential for further democratic gains in the region if the virtuous circle of free elections and policy improvements is allowed to take hold.

AMERICAS

Despite successful elections, freedom remains in jeopardy

Although Freedom in the World has recorded the downfall of many long-standing dictatorships in the Americas over the last 50 years, the countries of the region continue to grapple with serious threats to political stability and fundamental rights. The relaxation of harsh or abusively enforced COVID-19 restrictions resulted in some improvements to freedom of movement in 2022, but dire political, economic, and humanitarian crises in repressive settings such as Cuba, Nicaragua, and Venezuela have reignited mass emigration. Independent media are also under pressure as powerful figures resist public scrutiny: authorities in Guatemala arrested the founder and president of one of the country's most prominent newspapers, and journalists in Uruguay faced threats and lawsuits for their reporting.

Rotations of power through elections continued to provide opportunities for democratic progress, though the risk of antidemocratic breakdowns persisted. Free, fair, and competitive balloting in two of the region's most populous countries led to victories for opposition candidates. In Colombia, Gustavo Petro became the nation's first left-wing president, and his running mate, Francia Márquez, became the first Black woman to serve as vice president. Another leftist challenger, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, defeated incumbent Jair Bolsonaro for the presidency of Brazil, and calls for a military coup to reverse this outcome were rebuffed amid violence by Bolsonaro's supporters. But Pedro Castillo, who rose from obscurity to become Peru's president in 2021, was impeached and arrested after an unsuccessful attempt to dissolve Congress, leaving his successor, former vice president Dina Boluarte, to cope with widespread protests and a lethal crackdown by security forces.

Perennial weaknesses in the rule of law remained a challenge for many countries in the region. Amid a prolonged political vacuum in Haiti, gangs took over the capital and violently restricted people's freedom of movement and access to basic resources. President Nayib Bukele of El Salvador declared a state of exception and suspended constitutional rights as part of a crackdown on gangs. The resulting arbitrary arrests, deaths in custody, lack of due process, and restrictions on speech severely damaged civil liberties. In neighboring Honduras, President Xiomara Castro similarly announced a state of exception and suspended constitutional protections in many neighborhoods, ordering the military to lead the campaign against gang violence. These official responses were aimed at addressing a genuine threat to public security, but their undemocratic methods made a poor foundation for the observance of basic freedoms in the future.

ASIA-PACIFIC

Democracy movements contend with authoritarian retrenchment

ASIA-PACIFIC:
Democracy movements contend with authoritarian retrenchment

While some countries in the Asia-Pacific region have overcome decades of dictatorship to establish resilient democracies, authoritarian forces elsewhere continue to push back against domestic calls for liberty and justice.

Examples of progress in 2022 were largely driven by prodemocracy political movements and small improvements in judicial independence, anticorruption efforts, and freedom of movement. In Sri Lanka, protesters persevered through police violence and ultimately forced the resignation of the long-dominant Rajapaksa family from their multiple positions in government, though years of mismanagement left the country with serious economic and governance challenges. In Malaysia, the results of general elections offered the promise of political and social reforms, and the judiciary displayed increased independence by upholding the 2020 corruption conviction of former prime minister Najib Razak. The Philippines also held elections, and while the son of a former dictator won the presidency, the competitive campaign had the effect of mobilizing millions of young voters. In Myanmar, broad-based resistance to the military junta that ousted elected leaders in 2021 kept the regime from consolidating control over the country or gaining international legitimacy.

Residents of several countries, including India and Australia, enjoyed greater freedom of movement following the rollback of COVID-19 restrictions. However, democratic rights in India remain under pressure, particularly for marginalized groups, with authorities in Uttar Pradesh responding to Muslim-led protests by demolishing the property of Muslim citizens. In Vietnam, a one-party state where freedom is still heavily restricted, the government made notable efforts to combat COVID-19-related corruption, including by investigating and prosecuting officials implicated in price-fixing and bribery scandals.

Despite these limited gains, the freedoms of expression, belief, and association came under attack in other settings from across the democratic spectrum. In the Solomon Islands, the government asserted greater financial and editorial control over the public broadcaster and threatened to prevent critical foreign journalists from entering the country. Religious freedom was hamstrung in Hong Kong amid broader crackdowns on dissent, with some churches and clergy self-censoring their sermons and limiting other religious activity. In Afghanistan, the Taliban regime dealt another blow to academic freedom and gender equality by extensively censoring educational materials and barring women from attending universities.

The Communist Party regime in China remained one of the world's worst abusers of political rights and civil liberties, and those who criticized the party received severe penalties. Chinese citizens did take to the streets to protest the government's harsh "zero COVID" policy in a rare nationwide display of dissent that resulted in the abrupt abandonment of many restrictions. Nevertheless, protesters continued to encounter pervasive surveillance, abusive interrogations, and intimidation at the hands of authorities.

EURASIA

Military conflict and domestic unrest as autocracies stumble

Three decades after the fall of the Soviet Union, authoritarianism dominates Eurasia, with no formerly Soviet countries designated as Free aside from the three Baltic states. This lack of democratic governance has destabilized the region, as strongman rulers use military force to lash out at their neighbors and smother domestic dissent. In 2022, Moscow's full-scale invasion of Ukraine took center stage amid a broader array of active and frozen conflicts between Eurasian governments. The February attack marked a dramatic escalation after eight years of more limited Russian aggression, resulting in tens of thousands of deaths, Europe's largest refugee crisis, and far-reaching economic and security implications for the entire world.

The war in Ukraine had significant repercussions for Belarusian sovereignty, as Russian troops operated from Belarusian soil. It also raised the threat of renewed conflict in Moldova, whose separatist Transnistria region has long hosted a Russian garrison, and increased tensions in Georgia's Russian-backed breakaway territories of Abkhazia and South Ossetia, from which Moscow withdrew some of its forces to help relieve units in Ukraine. The Kremlin's preoccupation with Ukraine hampered its ability to manage or manipulate rivalries elsewhere. Azerbaijan's regime stepped up its military aggression toward Armenia despite a Russian security guarantee, and a surge in cross-border shelling occurred between Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan in September, killing approximately 100 people.

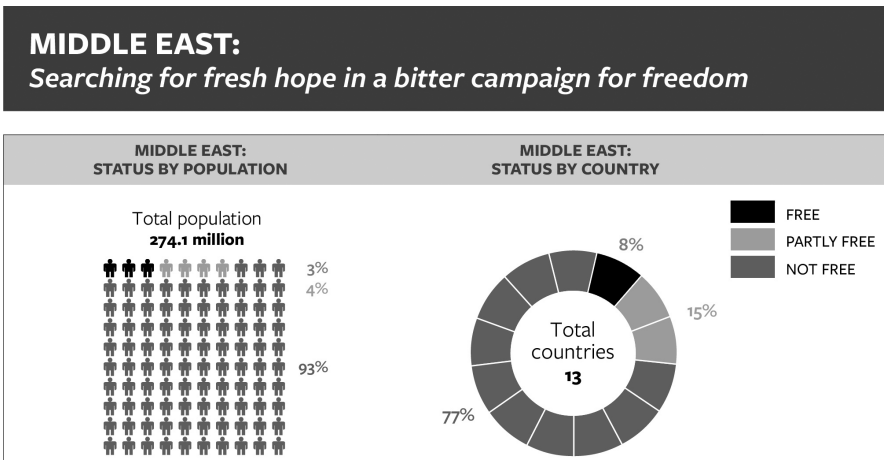
The limited space for free media in Eurasia has diminished further due to new criminal laws and legislative restrictions. Russian authorities criminalized criticism of the war in Ukraine, expanded a punitive "foreign agents" law, and cracked down on the few independent outlets that still operated in Russia. Pro-Kremlin propaganda efforts have become more aggressive abroad, with officials in Belarus and Turkmenistan bolstering Moscow's image and criticizing democracies for supporting Kyiv. In Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan, lawmakers placed additional constraints on media outlets and journalists, passing new legislation that obliged foreign online platforms to register as local legal entities and empowered authorities to censor "undesired" information and ban media outlets without court approval.

These efforts to suppress criticism did little to address the root causes of public discontent, which continued to erupt into protests and elicit lethal responses from security forces. Mass demonstrations triggered by increased fuel prices in Kazakhstan resulted in over 200 deaths, and protests in Uzbekistan over proposed constitutional amendments left more than a dozen people dead and hundreds injured.

EUROPE

Illiberal forces challenge solidarity against external aggression

Peace and freedom in Europe have been threatened not only by Moscow's invasion of Ukraine, but also by far-right leaders who could undermine democratic solidarity.



The war in Ukraine forced European democracies to rethink their security needs in 2022. Finland and Sweden dropped their long-standing policies of military neutrality and applied to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), while Germany moved to double its defense budget. The European Union (EU) stood firm and united in imposing sanctions on Russia, providing billions of dollars in aid to Ukraine and welcoming large numbers of Ukrainian refugees.

At the same time, a series of important elections signaled the growing strength of right-wing populist parties, which often stray from democratic principles and seek cooperation with authoritarian powers. In Italy, Giorgia Meloni and her Brothers of Italy party took the helm of a new governing coalition, though she expressed more support for Ukraine than some of her partners. In Sweden, the Sweden Democrats emerged as the second-largest force in the parliament and enabled a new right-leaning government to take office. In Hungary and Serbia, entrenched illiberal nationalist leaders reasserted their power: Hungarian prime minister Viktor Orbán defeated a united opposition front, winning a fourth consecutive term, and Serbian president Aleksandar Vučić secured a second five-year term after a decade in government. Nonetheless, illiberal forces were defeated in some countries. French president Emmanuel Macron turned back a strong challenge from far-right candidate Marine Le Pen, and Slovenians elected a new left-liberal government, rejecting the abuses of power associated with right-wing populist prime minister Janez Janša.

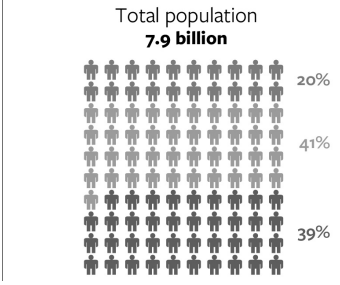
While free expression is generally protected across most of the region, the EU was plunged into spyware scandals in 2022 after journalists and politicians came under surveillance in Spain, Greece, Hungary, and Poland. In addition, the authoritarian government in Turkey adopted a draconian "disinformation" law that hindered free speech and independent journalism ahead of elections in 2023. Despite these setbacks, several European states strengthened safeguards for personal autonomy. San Marino decriminalized abortion, Andorra and Slovenia legalized same-sex marriage, and Liechtenstein passed a measure on full adoption equality for same-sex couples.

MIDDLE EAST

Searching for fresh hope in a bitter campaign for freedom

Popular demand for greater freedom in the Middle East continues to run up against some of the most entrenched systems of repression in the world, many of which are propped up or shielded by foreign powers—including democracies—with vested trade and security interests in the region.

In Iran, massive prodemocracy protests broke out following the death of a Kurdish woman in police custody, bringing global attention to the Islamic Republic's long history of discrimination and brutality. Citizens returned to the streets again and again despite an acute risk that they would be beaten, arrested, shot, or executed by security forces.



Elsewhere in the Middle East, journalists and human rights defenders faced an uphill battle in their efforts to highlight and address state abuses. A Palestinian-American journalist was killed by Israeli forces while covering a military raid on a refugee camp in the occupied West Bank. Ahead of international soccer's World Cup in Qatar, a number of local activists were given life sentences for their participation in peaceful protests.

While political rights and civil liberties are few and far between in a region dominated by despotic regimes, there was some piecemeal progress during the year. In Kuwait, a court overturned a law used to prosecute transgender people, finding that it violated the right to personal freedom. In Lebanon, members of a rising civic opposition bloc gained representation in parliamentary elections, eroding the dominance of established sectarian parties. But in Israel, the region's only country ranked Free, election results painted a grimmer picture: former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu returned to power at the head of a coalition with far-right elements, and the new government's agenda posed a direct threat to judicial independence and other democratic principles, as well as to the basic rights of Palestinians.

GLOBAL: STATUS BY POPULATION

GLOBAL: STATUS BY COUNTRY

Freedom in the World 2023 Status Changes

Burkina Faso

Burkina Faso's status declined from Partly Free to Not Free due to the effects of two successive military coups, including the suspension of the constitution and dissolution of the legislature, and an expanding conflict with Islamist militant groups.

Colombia

Colombia's status improved from Partly Free to Free due to more open and competitive national elections, a decline in restrictions on assembly and movement, and the decriminalization of abortion. However, illegal armed groups remained active, and the country was still one of the deadliest in the world for human rights defenders.

Lesotho

Lesotho's status improved from Partly Free to Free due to the formation of a new government following competitive parliamentary elections, though the country continued to face serious security and governance challenges.

Peru

Peru's status declined from Free to Partly Free because the president was impeached and arrested after attempting to dissolve the legislature and rule by decree, and protests by his supporters led to deadly clashes with police.

Countries in the Spotlight

The following countries featured important developments in 2022 that affected their democratic trajectory, and they deserve special scrutiny in 2023.

Armenia: Azerbaijani forces continued to attack and occupy Armenian territory along the border, threatening the democratic government in Yerevan and raising the risk of full-scale war.

Brazil: Challenger Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva won a presidential runoff against incumbent Jair Bolsonaro, but the outgoing president's supporters rejected the results and called for a military coup.

Haiti: A government with no electoral mandate sought international support amid persistent protests and a growing humanitarian crisis, with gang violence displacing tens of thousands of residents.

Israel: Elections resulted in a new government with far-right elements, and critics warned that its policy agenda could undermine judicial independence and other core elements of democracy.

Kenya: William Ruto's election as president, and the peaceful transfer of power that followed, marked a major improvement over the disputed contest of 2017 and strengthened Kenya's democratic credentials.

Poland: The ruling Law and Justice party grappled with the European Commission over judicial independence concerns as it prepared for crucial parliamentary elections in late 2023.

Solomon Islands: After signing a security pact with Beijing, the government asserted control over the media and postponed general elections from 2023 to 2024.

Sri Lanka: Following protests over a worsening economic crisis, the president and prime minister fled their posts, and the ruling party was due to face frustrated voters in 2023 local elections.

Turkey: The government manipulated electoral laws and imposed harsh penalties for "disinformation" as it worked to fend off the opposition ahead of planned 2023 general elections.

United Kingdom: The ruling Conservative Party cycled through three prime ministers in two months, advanced new restrictions on strikes and protests, and attempted to remove certain asylum seekers to Rwanda.

Status Change Explanations

Burkina Faso: Burkina Faso's status declined from Partly Free to Not Free due to the effects of two successive military coups, including the suspension of the constitution and dissolution of the legislature, and an expanding conflict with Islamist militant groups.

Colombia: Colombia's status improved from Partly Free to Free due to more open and competitive national elections, a decline in restrictions on assembly and movement, and the decriminalization of abortion. However, illegal armed groups remained active, and the country was still one of the deadliest in the world for human rights defenders.

Lesotho: Lesotho's status improved from Partly Free to Free due to the formation of a new government following competitive parliamentary elections, though the country continued to face serious security and governance challenges.

Peru: Peru's status declined from Free to Partly Free because the president was impeached and arrested after attempting to dissolve the legislature and rule by decree, and protests by his supporters led to deadly clashes with police.

Policy Recommendations

Political will is essential to the protection and expansion of freedom. The powerful and unified response to Moscow's unprovoked war of aggression in Ukraine demonstrated how rapidly democracies can take action—within a matter of days—when there is political will to do so. That same political will is needed globally to push back on clear authoritarian threats to democracy and freedom around the world.

Autocrats persist in flouting laws and norms in part because they do not believe democracies are serious about upholding them. For decades, Freedom House and others have recommended that democratic governments work to defend fundamental freedoms, support and create space for civil society, protect rights defenders at risk, and hold authoritarian regimes accountable for abuses. And for decades, democratic governments have failed to consistently muster the political will to implement these recommendations in a coordinated, sufficiently scaled, sustainable manner, with political leaders too willing to turn a blind eye to rights violations for the sake of perceived short-term gains in prosperity or security.

But the protection of rights and democratic principles is an economic and security imperative. Economic prosperity and a more secure global community require a global order based on the rule of law, anticorruption safeguards, and a willingness to abide by international security norms; only democracies can maintain such an order. Democratic leaders who ignore this fact imperil not just global freedom, but also security and economic growth.

In 2023, as the deterioration of political rights and civil liberties slows and the limits of authoritarian power become clearer, democracies should prioritize the following actions to help reverse the damage caused by the 17-year democratic recession.

1. Help Ukraine win.
2. Stop enabling authoritarians.
3. Be clear and unapologetic about the virtues of democracy and tireless in efforts to uphold and defend it.
4. Protect press freedom and personal expression.
5. Dramatically ramp up support for human rights defenders and for countries and regions at critical junctures.

Help Ukraine win. Achieving victory in Ukraine, on Ukraine's terms, is an imperative not just for the people of Ukraine or for Europe, but for the world. Beyond its devastating physical destruction and emotional toll, the war is also a direct attack on Ukraine's domestic efforts to build a robust democracy. Anything less than victory in Ukraine will all but guarantee further Russian aggression in the region, could discourage or undermine democratization efforts in neighboring countries for fear of escalatory coercive measures by the Kremlin and additional malign interference, and could encourage other authoritarian rulers to undertake more brazen efforts to undermine democracy and human rights.

Democratic governments must remain unwavering in their support for Ukraine and its people, including by providing weapons and technical and security assistance to help ensure victory on the battlefield. They must continue to provide financial resources to the government of Ukraine, with appropriate oversight, to help it withstand the considerable economic and social shocks that the full-scale invasion has caused. Such funding is critical for keeping basic government services operational, and for responding to humanitarian need.

Democratic countries must also continue to support individuals engaged in the vital wartime work of monitoring and reporting on human rights violations and collecting evidence of war crimes. Russian authorities and any other individuals or entities that are materially supporting this illegal invasion must be held accountable through sanctions, asset freezes or seizures that support Ukrainian reconstruction, and justice in a court of law for the war crimes that have been committed.

Finally, democracies must be prepared to support Ukraine as it rebuilds and continues to strengthen its democratic institutions and norms. Close partnership with Ukrainian civil society will be essential in this process.

Stop enabling authoritarians. Too often, democracies remain silent about authoritarian behavior because they have security or economic interests with the government in question. They frequently take an "all or nothing" approach to bilateral engagement—either cutting off the relationship entirely, out of concern for the authoritarian's abusive practices, or engaging fully and muting any criticism of human rights violations. In a globalized world in which there are multiple overlapping interests, democracies must find ways to pursue economic and security goals while simultaneously advancing democracy and freedom agendas through their bilateral engagements. Prioritizing the economic and security matters without also exerting pressure on regimes for their undemocratic behavior only emboldens autocratic leaders, contributing to the continuation of their rule and the instability it produces.

Democracies must stop legitimizing dictators. It is often necessary for democratic leaders to engage with undemocratic counterparts while conducting diplomacy; they should not, however, provide them with the same degree of symbolic recognition that freely elected officials receive. Democratic leaders should refrain from congratulating "winners" of rigged elections and should work with partners and allies to swiftly denounce coups or the violation of legally established term limits, restricting foreign assistance as appropriate. Significant international sporting and cultural events should not be held in countries governed by authoritarian regimes.

Democracies must address corruption and kleptocracy head on by closing the many financial loopholes that allow authoritarian rulers to hide or launder stolen assets in democratic nations. Despots rely on their cash stores to pay off the cronies who help keep them in power, and they are able to deploy massive financial resources to crush democratic opposition.

Democracies should significantly reduce their reliance on natural resources or manufactured goods from authoritarian regimes. Companies should adhere to the UN Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights and exercise caution when doing business in authoritarian states, conducting periodic assessments to fully understand how their products and actions might affect human rights. Members of the public should exert pressure on businesses by refusing to purchase goods from those that cannot demonstrate that their practices ensure responsible supply chains.

When rights abuses or corrupt activity occur, democracies should coordinate to impose meaningful penalties, including targeted sanctions, suspension of nonhumanitarian economic support, and ostracization on the international stage. Sanctions should also be imposed on individuals or entities that knowingly help authoritarians evade sanctions. Particularly in situations where those in power are violating human rights with impunity, such as in Afghanistan, Ethiopia, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo, or where large-scale atrocities are occurring, as in China, democracies should work together to impose legal and financial consequences.

At international forums, democracies should focus on deepening solidarity between Free and Partly Free countries, working together to censure autocrats, promote the election of democratic nations to positions of power, and give greater scrutiny to member-state compliance with charters and treaties.

Be clear and unapologetic about the virtues of democracy and tireless in efforts to uphold and defend it. Leaders should communicate frequently with the public about why and how democracy outperforms more autocratic systems, citing its reliance on the will and consent of the governed, deliberation and fair competition, mechanisms for accountability and self-correction, and the inclusion of all people regardless of the circumstances of their birth or background. Though no democracy is perfect, democracies are safer and more stable because when one institution falls short of democratic standards, the others are used as tools to repair and strengthen the system.

Democracies, both Free and Partly Free, must address backsliding at home, working to reduce barriers to democratic participation, such as social exclusion and poverty, and addressing polarization and extremism. The protection of free and fair elections, adherence to term limits by election officials, and respect for laws and institutions are essential to a strong democracy.

Democracies should make the protection of freedom and democratic governance a fundamental component of all international policy—including foreign, security, and economic policy—and of every diplomatic engagement. Human rights concerns should be raised in meetings at all levels. Democratic leaders should routinely meet with exiled democracy activists and rights defenders from authoritarian states before traveling to those countries, and with in-country activists while traveling, if they can do so without endangering their interlocutors. Democracies should also guard against foreign influence and interference and work together to build resilience against authoritarian economic coercion.

Democracies should collaborate to incentivize democratic progress. This effort must include a wide range of democracies, not just those in North America, Europe, and East Asia, and must incorporate solutions driven by democratic governments all over the world. Democracies should use development finance and country compacts to boost inclusive growth, encourage democratic governance, and prevent debt traps. They should focus on negotiating narrow, high-impact economic agreements that set high standards for governance and rights protection.

Protect press freedom and personal expression. Among the many rights under attack globally over the last 17 years, Freedom House data show that freedom of expression, both for the media and for individuals, has declined more than any other civil liberty, and infringement on free expression is one of biggest drivers of global democratic decline.

Democracies should scale up efforts to support independent media—including public-interest journalism and exile media—through financial assistance and innovative financing models, technical support, skills training, and mentoring, and should condemn attacks against journalists and media outlets. They should work to address disinformation and misinformation and support technologies that allow for expanded transmission of fact-based reporting and information into countries where authoritarian regimes are controlling or limiting the internet. They should also expand protections for journalists who face physical attacks and harassment, including by supporting the creation of emergency visas for those at risk and bringing those who threaten or attack them to justice. Laws should protect the free flow of information, grant journalists access to elected officials, allow the public to use freedom of information requests, and guard against state monopolization of media outlets.

Governments and internet service providers should make every effort to support and maintain reliable access to the internet.

Like media freedom, the freedom of personal expression faces growing threats, both online and off. The expression of individual identities, religious views, and political opinions is a core component of being human. Democracies must fiercely guard this right at home and vigorously work to defend it abroad, as the climate of fear created by harsh repression of personal expression helps dictators remain in power. To protect expression online, foreign assistance for internet freedom should prioritize the provision of technologies that help individuals in closed environments circumvent government censorship, protect themselves against surveillance, and overcome restrictions on connectivity. Assistance should also include digital security and digital activism trainings for human rights defenders, and programs that seek to strengthen judicial independence and enhance technical literacy among judges and others within the legal system. Governments should carefully scrutinize the export of technologies and products that could be used to violate human rights, placing strict limits on the sale of those that enable monitoring, surveillance, interception, or collection of personal information and communications.

Democracies should reform domestic surveillance practices so that they adhere to the International Principles on the Application of Human Rights to Communications Surveillance; strictly regulate the use of surveillance tools; protect robust encryption, which is vital for the security of activists, journalists, and ordinary people around the world; and strengthen data-privacy protections.

Dramatically ramp up support for human rights defenders and for countries and regions at critical junctures. While governments, movements, and activists working for democratic progress must lead the change in their own countries, the odds may be stacked against them without significant support from foreign governments and organizations that are committed to the expansion of democracy and human rights. If democracy assistance is to be effective, it must be provided at a sufficient scale and in a sustained manner. Those working on the front lines to uphold and protect fundamental freedoms for their fellow citizens are the true agents of positive change in any country. But courageous action of the sort the world has witnessed in Iran, where protesters are boldly defying a brutal regime, warrants a clear demonstration of international solidarity.

Democratic governments should help human rights defenders and civil society groups remain in their countries of origin whenever possible. Technical assistance and training on issues like coalition and constituency building, advocacy, organizational development, and physical and digital security are particularly helpful, as is flexible funding that affords groups the agility to respond to needs as they arise. Government agencies that provide foreign assistance should seek to create opportunities for groups that could play an important role in a future civic mobilization to connect with national, regional, and international prodemocracy organizations—and with one another—to share strategies, tools, and approaches.

When rights defenders come under threat, democracies should help provide medical, legal, and psychosocial support as needed. When these defenders are imprisoned, democratic governments, international civil society groups, and members of the public should condemn their detention, seek their immediate and unconditional release, and call for the dropping of all charges. Should it become necessary for rights defenders to relocate, temporary internal relocation is often most desirable. When a situation becomes so dangerous that defenders and activists need to be evacuated from their country, democratic governments should be prepared to provide temporary visas or long-term residency, and support for exiled activists to resume their lives and vital work. Activists and rights defenders from authoritarian states that have been sanctioned also sometimes experience banking obstacles or other challenges related to private-sector risk aversion. Democratic governments should work with the private sector to minimize such inadvertent impacts.

Democracies must remain vigilant to combat transnational repression. Between 2014 and 2021, Freedom House found that authorities in at least 36 origin countries had reached beyond their own borders to intimidate, harass, and even kidnap or murder exiled dissidents and members of diaspora communities across 84 countries. Democratic governments should guard against the commission of transnational repression on their soil by ensuring that laws are updated as needed, providing officials with training to recognize and respond to transnational repression, reaching out to diaspora groups that may be targeted, and prosecuting or imposing sanctions on perpetrators.

In addition, democracy assistance should be focused on countries and regions facing critical junctures. Freedom House research has shown that once a country tips into the Partly Free or Not Free categories, it often struggles to recover. This makes the provision of diplomatic, technical, and financial support especially important for countries that have seen promising democratic development or are at risk of democratic deterioration. These include Kenya and Zambia, which have experienced recent improvements; Armenia, Sri Lanka, and El Salvador, where democracy is under pressure; and Nigeria, Turkey, India, and Thailand, which face important upcoming elections, among others. Democracies should help democratically inclined leaders and local civil society organizations in these countries deliver tangible expansions of political rights and civil liberties.

Democratic governments should also work with civil society to prepare for change. No authoritarian regime is permanent; autocracies can seem durable until they suddenly collapse. Only 12 countries that exist today have always been rated Not Free in Freedom in the World. And even within those countries—including Cuba and China—protests against governance problems like corruption, societal restrictions, and economic mismanagement can draw large numbers and broad support. Democratic governments should provide vocal, public endorsements of grassroots prodemocracy movements and respond to any violent crackdown by authorities with targeted sanctions, reduced or conditioned foreign assistance if the country had been receiving any, and public condemnation. Democracies must be prepared for political upheaval in Not Free countries and draw up serious contingency plans for responding to political change, both negative and positive, including the emergence of widespread popular movements for a more open society. More broadly, policy strategies for Not Free countries should not rely on the assumption that the current systems and conditions will persist indefinitely.

Introduction

The Freedom in the World 2023 survey contains reports on 195 countries and 15 territories. Each country report begins with a section containing the following information: population, capital, freedom status (Free, Partly Free, or Not Free), and an "electoral democracy" designation. Each territory report begins with a section containing the same information, except for the capital. The population figures are drawn primarily from the 2022 World Population Data Sheet of the Population Reference Bureau.

The political rights and civil liberties ratings range from 1 to 7, with 1 representing the most free and 7 the least free. The status designation of Free, Partly Free, or Not Free, which is determined by the average of the political rights and civil liberties ratings, indicates the general state of freedom in a country or territory. A brief explanation of status changes is provided for each country or territory as required. Any improvements or declines in the ratings since the previous survey are noted next to the relevant number in each report. For a full description of the methods used to determine the survey's ratings, please see the chapter on the survey's methodology.

Following the section described above, each country and territory report is composed of three parts: an overview, bullets on key developments, and an analysis of political rights and civil liberties. The overview provides a succinct, general description that explains the country or territory's place on the 0–7 rating scale; bullets on key developments summarize key events that took place in 2022; and the section on political rights and civil liberties analyzes the degree of respect for the rights and liberties that Freedom House uses to evaluate freedom in the world. This section is composed of seven parts that correspond to the seven main subcategories in the methodology and justify a country or territory's score for each indicator. The scores for each indicator, subcategory, and category, along with any changes from the previous year, are noted next to the relevant subheading.

Country Reports

Afghanistan

Population: 41,100,000
Capital: Kabul
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Afghanistan's elected government, which had been undermined by an insurgency waged by the Taliban as well as violence, corruption, and flawed electoral processes, nevertheless offered a wide range of individual rights before the Taliban overthrew it in 2021. Since taking power, the Taliban have demonstrated their intolerance for political opposition. Women and minority groups have seen their rights curtailed, while journalists are restricted by harsh edicts and the threat of violence. Meanwhile, the population is facing economic and humanitarian crises.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Afghans experienced dire economic circumstances as the country suffered the withdrawal of aid, drought, and a banking crisis. In May, the World Food Programme (WFP) reported that 92 percent of the population did not eat enough food.
- The Taliban severely restricted rights for women and girls during the year. In March, it kept secondary schools for girls closed. In May, women were ordered to wear clothing that only exposed their eyes in public. In December, women were banned from higher education; the Ministry of Economy ordered nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to stop female employees from reporting for work that same month.
- In November, the regime's supreme leader, Haibatullah Akhundzada, issued a decree calling on judges and prosecutors to issue punishments consistent with its interpretation of Sharia law. Authorities began imposing corporal punishment later that month, while the regime held its first public execution in December.
- The Islamic State Khorasan Province (ISKP) militant group launched terrorist attacks throughout the year. It notably launched several attacks during the Ashura holiday in August, with the UN Assistance Mission in Afghanistan (UNAMA) reporting that 120 people were killed or injured.
- At least 1,000 people in Afghanistan were killed when an earthquake struck near the border with Pakistan in June.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The Taliban overthrew an elected government in 2021; that September, the Taliban declared the formation of the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan (IEA) and installed an unelected cabinet. Mohammad Hasan Akhund, the head of the movement's Rehbari Shura (Leadership Council), was named prime minister and remained in that post as of the end of 2022. Haibatullah Akhundzada, the movement's leader, was named the IEA's supreme leader, or amir. Akhundzada exercised unfettered powers to rule by decree and make all appointments to state bodies.

No legislative assembly or representative body operates in the IEA. Akhundzada's decrees and orders from ministers have taken the place of legislation and regulation.

A bicameral National Assembly existed under the 2004 constitution. The last assembly was constituted after elections in 2018 but many of its members went into exile after the republic fell.

In March 2022, the Taliban allowed residents in Kabul to vote for local representatives to liaise with the authorities.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

Under the republic, elections were administered by the Independent Election Commission and disputes adjudicated by the Electoral Complaints Commission. Both were abolished in late 2021. Besides the March 2022 polls in Kabul, there is no provision for elections in the IEA.

In 2021, the Taliban announced that they would enforce parts of the 1964 constitution that did not contradict their interpretation of Sharia, rejecting the 2004 constitution used by the republic. In September 2022, Deputy Justice Minister Abdul Karim Haider said the country did not need a constitution, and instead need only rely on the Quran, the sunnah of the prophet Muhammad—referring to a collection of social and legal customs that informs Sharia—and Islamic jurisprudence.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Afghanistan is an effective one-party state under the Taliban. Political parties have no legal protection. However, some parties informally operate in Afghanistan; their leaders operate in exile abroad.

The government of the IEA is exclusively composed of Taliban members. No other party has a share in or can compete for power. The Taliban tolerate no opposition.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Citizens cannot exercise any meaningful political choice under the Taliban. Policymaking, resource allocation, and the selection of officials all take place opaquely within the structures of the IEA. At most, some Taliban officials in provincial administrations are reportedly open to limited consultation and lobbying by male community representatives.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

No group in Afghanistan enjoys political rights or electoral opportunities. Some groups are particularly marginalized and excluded from the limited public debate that does occur.

Under the Taliban, women are excluded from any position of official authority and are additionally impacted by restrictions on their movement. A June–July 2022 assembly that included clerics and traditional leaders included no women.

Most Taliban members belong to the Pashtun ethnic group, which is believed to represent 42 percent of the Afghan population. Members of that group hold top positions in powerful ministries, though non-Pashtun members of the Taliban hold less powerful posts.

LGBT+ people are thoroughly excluded from political participation; the Taliban support the former republic's criminalization of same-sex relations and reject LGBT+ rights.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Decision-making within the IEA is highly opaque. Its leader was proclaimed, not elected. There is no national legislature to check the leadership. A council of ministers functions in Kabul but Akhundzada and his advisers, who are based in Kandahar, hold ultimate authority.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

The Taliban claim to have achieved progress in checking widespread corruption present under the republic, particularly in the field of revenue collection. However, institutional safeguards have been weakened. In December 2022, a regime spokesman said the work of the Anti-Corruption Commission had been suspended for financial reasons but would resume.

Petty corruption has also been reported under the current regime. Individuals seeking passports, for example, have had to pay bribes.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

There is no transparency in Taliban governance and decision-making. The national budget released in May 2022 did not include significant detail. Ministers provided few details of their ministries' activities and avoided questions in public accountability sessions held in August and September.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 7 / 60 (−2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16 (−2)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Media freedom is severely restricted under the Taliban. Media outlets are subject to intrusive monitoring and guidance by multiple Taliban organs, which are reinforced through threats and violence. The Afghan media sector has also suffered from the loss of state patronage, donor funding, and private-sector revenue. Many Afghan journalists have fled for other countries in the region and have sought asylum in European countries and the United States since the republic's fall.

In March 2022, local-language television content produced by the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) was taken off the air. Output from China Global Television Network, Deutsche Welle, and Voice of America (VOA) was also banned that month.

According to a December 2021 report released by Reporters Without Borders (RSF) and the Afghan Independent Journalists Association, 231 of the 543 outlets that operated immediately before the Taliban's takeover closed by the end of that year. Some 6,430 media workers, meanwhile, were no longer working in the field. Women were especially affected, with 84 percent of female workers losing their jobs.

Since September 2021, the IEA has introduced at least three sets of guidelines for the media, though the guidelines were not publicly shared. Among other things, these guidelines instruct outlets and journalists to show respect for Islam, desist from reporting news items considered false, refrain from publishing information the regime has not confirmed, and operate within cultural norms. Entertainment programming that is believed to violate social and cultural norms is banned. Women's dress is also restricted under the guidelines. At least three Taliban organs have actively enforced these restrictions: the Ministry of Information and Culture, the Ministry of Vice and Virtue (MVV), and the General Directorate of Intelligence (GDI).

In practice, authorities have exercised arbitrary control over the media, well beyond what is implied by their published guidelines. Journalists have been subject to arbitrary arrest, detention, threats, and harassment, primarily from the GDI. Pressure has mainly been directed towards ensuring favorable coverage of the regime, stifling criticism, and reducing coverage of opponents and critics. Self-censorship is pervasive as a result.

Established outlets now operate from abroad, while new outlets focused on Afghanistan have been formed outside the country since the IEA was established; all these outlets rely on social media to share their output. The Taliban have increased their own social-media activity and have warned people against accessing critical posts. Nevertheless, social media remains uncensored and accessible to Afghans.

Religious freedom, which was already hampered by violence and discrimination under the republic, has been heavily curtailed by the Taliban, who vigorously assert their interpretation of the Hanafi school of Sunni Islam.

During 2022, the MVV expanded its moral code covering dress, behavior, and religious observance. In January, the MVV placed posters in Kabul that called on women to dress according to the regime's interpretation of Sharia. In May, the MVV ordered women to wear clothing that only exposed their eyes in public and urged them to remain at home. The MVV also intensified enforcement operations, though provincial-level directorates reportedly exercised a degree of discretion in applying the new code.

Government organs, particularly the GDI, have systematically persecuted religious minorities. Adherents of Salafism have been especially targeted, with members facing arbitrary detention, forced disappearance, torture, and summary execution by the Taliban, who accuse them of supporting the ISKP. Christians, who are few in number, also face arrest and violence.

The regime does not persecute members of the Hazara community, most of whom identify as Shiite, as a matter of policy. However, Hazaras face persecution in practice, with individual members being targeted and houses of worship being desecrated during military operations in Hazara-majority areas. Hazara and Shiite populations were also targeted by the ISKP in 2022. The ISKP launched several attacks during the Ashura holiday in August, killing and injuring over 120 people according to UNAMA. In late September, at least 53 people were killed when a suicide bomber detonated a device in a Hazara-majority section of Kabul.

The regime sought to transform Afghanistan's educational system during 2022; it initiated an ideologically driven review of the curriculum, patronized its supporters when recruiting teachers, and banned books and other materials. The regime has also favored religious schools over other institutions; several dozen schools, universities, and training centers have been converted into religious institutions since the IEA was established.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the Taliban sought to ideologically reshape the country's education curriculum, favored religious schools over other institutions, and banned books.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4 (−1)

Afghans cannot freely engage in private discussion without risking offline and online surveillance. Criticism of the IEA or its moral code is grounds for arrest, as are sympathetic statements towards the National Resistance Front (NRF), an armed group that has resisted Taliban rule in the north. The GDI has worked to expand its network of agents, who are paid to inform on their neighbors' activities. Taliban routinely search mobile phones for social media comments criticizing the regime.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the Taliban subjected Afghans to more surveillance by expanding their network of informers and by searching individuals' mobile phones for evidence of dissent.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The Taliban use force to suppress demonstrations and media coverage of those demonstrations. However, the authorities reportedly orchestrate rallies to showcase views they promote, such as demands for the lifting of sanctions.

Afghan women continued to stage sporadic protests during 2022 but risked severe mistreatment for doing so. In October, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported incidents where female protesters were tortured by authorities, along with male relatives; female protesters told HRW that relatives, including children, were detained with them. Authorities used water cannons to disperse those protesting the higher-education ban in December.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

NGOs are permitted to operate as long as they are registered with the Ministry of Economy. However, they are subject to multiple and intrusive checks, including to ensure that they observe regulations on women's dress. In December 2022, the ministry told NGOs not to allow female employees to report for work and threatened to revoke the registration of NGOs for noncompliance. Several aid groups, including the Norwegian Refugee Council and Save the Children, suspended their operations as a result.

Authorities applied informal pressure to install their supporters on the boards of NGOs and pressured donors to interact with Taliban-controlled NGOs. NGOs involved in humanitarian operations faced pressure from the Taliban to prioritize their members and supporters when distributing aid. Personnel enjoyed no protection from harassment, and staff members belonging to the few human rights–focused organizations active in Afghanistan were particularly vulnerable. Human rights activists have been arrested, tortured, and killed since the Taliban returned to power, while many involved in human rights work have fled.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Under the 2004 constitution, Afghan workers had broad constitutional protections. However, labor rights were poorly defined, and no effective enforcement or dispute-resolution mechanisms existed. Unions were largely absent from the large informal and agricultural sectors. The rise of the Taliban has not yet had a noticeable effect on labor rights.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The IEA's judiciary is structurally similar to the judiciary of the defunct republic. However, the branch was purged and is now staffed by Taliban and supporters who are considered sufficiently reliable by the regime. Women, meanwhile, are absent. The attorney general's core responsibilities were stripped from that office by the regime.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

The Taliban do not recognize internationally accepted norms on due process. Their judges are supposed to operate under Hanafi jurisprudence instead of a clear code of procedure. Judges rely on confessions and uncorroborated witness testimony.

In November 2022, Akhundzada issued a decree calling on judges and prosecutors to issue punishments consistent with the regime's interpretation of Sharia. Later that month, reports emerged of people receiving corporal punishment for crimes including adultery, robbery, and corruption. Authorities administered whippings and amputations with little due process, as those facing corporal punishment were not allowed to employ counsel.

While the Taliban have asserted their intention to restore security in Afghanistan after overthrowing the republic, the Afghan population remained acutely vulnerable to armed conflict and violence in 2022. The ISKP engaged in terrorist activity while the NRF continued to wage an insurgency in the north. However, the South Asia Terrorism Portal counted 1,653 terrorism-related deaths in 2022, far fewer than the 8,469 deaths reported in 2021.

The ISKP claimed responsibility for attacks that killed or injured at least 700 people since the Taliban took power, according to HRW. In one of the attacks the ISKP launched in April, it used a remote explosive device to target a Shiite mosque in Mazar-e-Sharif, killing 31 people. It also launched several attacks during the Ashura holiday in August, with UNAMA reporting that 120 were killed or injured. In September, an ISKP suicide bomber targeted the Russian embassy in Kabul, killing at least six people. In December, ISKP fighters attacked a Kabul hotel, killing several people.

The NRF continued to engage in armed resistance during the year. In affected areas, the regime has arbitrarily detained and summarily executed suspected collaborators and has engaged in collective punishment.

In June 2022, the regime launched a military operation against a short-lived uprising by one of its commanders in a Hazara-majority district of Sar-e Pul Province. The regime's operation was accompanied by mass displacement, collective punishment, and accusations of summary executions.

While the regime claimed it was observing an amnesty announced in 2021, military personnel who served the republic were killed or disappeared during the year, suggesting a concerted campaign against perceived enemies sanctioned by the leadership and the GDI.

Since retaking power, the Taliban have instituted corporal punishment with little due process. In December 2022, the regime held its first public execution. Taliban also used violence against those perceived as dissenters or those who otherwise resisted edicts, norms, or individual demands. In November, for example, a vice-and-virtue official killed a girl in Balkh Province for refusing a marriage proposal.

Criminal violence is a regular occurrence. Perpetrators frequently benefited from Taliban protection or affiliation.

The IEA operates without a unified civil or criminal code. There is no clarity on which republic-era laws still apply.

Women face profound discrimination under the Taliban. Their employment opportunities have been severely curtailed; many women have been dismissed from public-sector and media-sector jobs. Restrictions on movement also impact women's employment prospects, with the MVV working to enforce a ban on women using mass transit unaccompanied. The regime has also restricted girls' and women's access to education. In March 2022, it officially closed secondary schools for girls despite previous assurances that they would be reopened; Akhundzada reportedly vetoed the reopening of those schools. In December, the regime banned female students from higher education.

The Taliban have engaged in discrimination against members of ethnic minority groups, particularly Tajiks, Hazaras, and Uzbeks.

There is no legal protection for LGBT+ people, who face societal disapproval and discrimination from the Taliban. In a 2021 interview, a Taliban judge advocated for the execution of men who engage in same-sex activity. LGBT+ people trying to flee Afghanistan face financial and administrative obstacles; gender nonconforming Afghans who spoke to HRW for a report released in January 2022 said they feared visiting passport offices and internal checkpoints.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 2 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

The regime places significant restrictions on individual movement, especially on women. Women must be accompanied by a chaperone for long-distance domestic travel and travel abroad. In March 2022, airline officials reported that unaccompanied women were removed from flights.

Authorities have used checkpoints to regulate internal movement and are known to engage in intrusive searches of travelers. Taliban reportedly search for known or perceived opponents of the regime at checkpoints, checking travelers' mobile phones and social media activity.

The regime rationed access to passports in 2022 in an effort to restrict emigration. It stopped issuing passports in October. The Taliban maintained a quota of passports for its own members, while others paid bribes and sought travel documents on the black market.

Internal displacement remains a significant problem. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees reported that 3.5 million Afghans were internally displaced at the end of 2022.

The Taliban have historically promised to respect existing property rights and provide enough security to allow for investment. However, the Taliban continued a pattern of property expropriation and extortion directed at the those affiliated with the defunct republic. Traders have complained of being driven out of business by arbitrary tax assessments. In some provinces, armed gangs have kidnapped and stolen from targets perceived as wealthy; these gangs are protected by the authorities. The Taliban have signaled that they would assert state ownership of land based on prerevolutionary records, effectively nullifying four decades' worth of transactions.

The Taliban ended the limited formal protections from domestic violence offered by the republic. Shelters for survivors of gender-based violence were closed by the Taliban and individuals who were convicted of such violence were among those released by the Taliban during their 2021 takeover.

The MVV has restricted the social freedoms of Afghans. Women are obliged to adopt Islamic dress as defined by the regime. Men, especially civil servants, were ordered to grow full beards and avoid "westernized" hairstyles or dress. However, enforcement is reportedly inconsistent.

Customary practices, including child marriage, the forced marriage of young girls to older men, and of widows to their husbands' male relatives, continue to restrict women's choices regarding marriage and divorce.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

The economic and governance crisis associated with the Taliban takeover intensified poverty and heightened Afghans' vulnerability to exploitation, while weakening safeguards. Aid agencies fear that as many as 120,000 children have been bartered or sold into marriage in the first eight months of the new regime's rule.

Food insecurity is pervasive; in May 2022, the WFP reported that 92 percent of Afghans do not eat enough food. Women and people living with disabilities were especially affected. Child labor has reportedly increased as Afghan families grapple with the country's economic crisis, with more children working in the mining sector.

Albania

Population: 2,800,000
Capital: Tirana
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Albania has a record of competitive elections, though political parties are highly polarized and often organized around leading personalities. Religious freedom and freedom of assembly are generally respected. Corruption and bribery remain major problems, though the government has endeavored to address corruption in the judiciary.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In February, the Constitutional Court ruled against then president Ilir Meta's 2021 impeachment, allowing him to complete his term. Lawmakers had impeached Meta over his conduct during that year's electoral period and over concerns that he had incited violence.
- Also in February, the parliament voted to extend the mandate of bodies responsible for vetting judges and prosecutors, as part of the government's ongoing efforts to combat corruption in the judicial branch.
- In June, lawmakers elected defense chief Bajram Begaj president, succeeding Meta. Parliamentarians from the opposition Democratic Party (PD) boycotted the vote. Opposition members voiced concerns over whether Begaj's status as a military officer made his selection unconstitutional.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 28 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is the head of state and is elected by the parliament for a maximum of two five-year terms; the office does not hold executive power, though the president has some authority over the judiciary and the armed forces. The prime minister is the head of government and is designated by the majority party or coalition. Because both the president and prime minister are selected by lawmakers, their legitimacy is generally dependent on the conduct of parliamentary elections.

In June 2022, the parliament elected defense chief Bajram Begaj to succeed Ilir Meta as president. Meta had been impeached by lawmakers in 2021 over his conduct during that year's electoral period, but the Constitutional Court overruled the parliament in February 2022, allowing him to complete his term. The PD boycotted the vote, with opposition lawmakers voicing concerns over whether his status as a military officer made his selection unconstitutional. Begaj took office in late July.

Socialist Party (PS) leader Edi Rama began his third term as prime minister following the April 2021 parliamentary elections.

The unicameral, 140-member Kuvendi (Assembly) is elected through proportional representation in 12 regional districts of varying size corresponding to administrative regions. All members serve four-year terms.

The ruling PS maintained its parliamentary majority in the April 2021 polls, winning 49 percent of the vote and 74 seats. The PD won 39 percent of the vote and 59 seats, while the Freedom Party (then known as the Socialist Movement of Integration) took 4 seats. Turnout stood at 46.3 percent.

The elections were administered under reforms adopted in 2020, ensuring the participation of opposition parties including the PD, which had boycotted previous polls. International observers called the elections well-organized and competitive. However, the elections were also marred by irregularities, including allegations of widespread vote buying, the misuse of administrative resources by the PS, and media bias that allowed the PS to "derive significant advantage from its incumbency." Despite such flaws, the results were widely accepted by stakeholders.

The Central Election Commission (CEC) administers polls. In 2020, the parliament established the Political Council, comprised of representatives of the three largest parties, to address electoral reforms recommended by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe. The parliament adopted several provisions of the Council's plan to gradually depoliticize election administration, introduce electronic identification of voters where technically possible, and restructure the CEC, among other changes. The CEC received additional responsibilities via these reforms.

The April 2021 elections were administered by the newly restructured CEC and were the first polls conducted after reforms were adopted in 2020. Despite concerns about the CEC's ability to manage the polls after the parliament's "extremely hasty" adoption of the electoral amendments, international observers reported that the elections proceeded smoothly and were competently and transparently administered.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

Albanian citizens generally have the right to organize in political parties. The two main parties, PS and PD, are sharply polarized and given to personality-driven rivalry. Candidates who do not belong to a party currently seated in the Assembly must collect a set number of signatures to run.

In January 2022, PD leader Lulzim Basha expelled former premier Sali Berisha from the party. The decision came after months of internal tension and days after Berisha supporters attempted to storm the party's headquarters. An intraparty conflict between the two men's supporters ensued; in March, Basha resigned as party leader, with Berisha succeeding him in May.

In Albania's multiparty system, opposition parties have the opportunity to participate in the political process and take power via the ballot box.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

While individuals are generally free to make their own political choices, powerful economic actors shape Albanian politics through their media holdings and influence on electoral campaigns. Criminal organizations and corrupt actors are also known to exert influence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Albanian law guarantees political rights for citizens regardless of their ethnic, racial, lingual, or religious identity. However, Roma and other marginalized communities remain vulnerable to political exploitation and have difficulty participating in politics.

Women are underrepresented in the Assembly, holding 35.7 percent of its seats. However, a record 12 women were appointed to the 17-member cabinet in September 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Since coming to power in 2017, the PS has largely been able to formulate and implement policy, though its ability to do so was somewhat impacted by a February 2019 opposition boycott. The potential for boycotts in the Assembly may weaken legislative oversight of the government.

Corruption is pervasive, and the European Union (EU) has repeatedly called for rigorous implementation of antigraft measures, particularly for corruption within the judiciary. In 2016, constitutional reforms established the Special Anticorruption Structure, which is tasked with investigating and prosecuting high-level corruption.

In a process monitored by EU and US experts, the government began vetting judges and prosecutors in 2018, to detect and combat corruption within the judiciary. A 2021 European Commission report praised Albania's anticorruption efforts, specifically noting the success of judicial vetting. In February 2022, the Assembly extended the mandate of vetting bodies to the end of 2024.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

A robust access-to-information law is not well implemented. Public procurement processes and public finances are frequently opaque, though parliamentary procedures are more open.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 39 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

While the constitution guarantees freedom of expression, the intermingling of powerful business, political, and media interests inhibits the development of independent news outlets; most are seen as biased toward either the PS or the PD. Reporters have little job security, low salaries, and remain subject to lawsuits, intimidation, and occasional physical attack by those facing media scrutiny.

In November 2022, Council of Europe (CoE) fact finders warned that the Albanian media environment was worsening due in part to media-sector concentration. The CoE mission also voiced concerns over the independence of the country's media regulator, the Audiovisual Media Authority.

The government restricted reporting on sensitive subjects in 2022. In June, prosecutors ordered outlets not to report on state witnesses' testimony from an organized-crime investigation. In September, prosecutors banned the publication of material that was revealed via a cyberattack.

The constitution provides for freedom of religion, which is generally upheld in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

The government typically does not limit academic freedom, though teachers in several districts have faced pressure ahead of elections to participate in political rallies. Access to higher education is affected by corruption.

There are no significant restrictions on private discussion.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected.

Several protests and events were held in 2022, including some political rallies that turned violent. In January, supporters of Sali Berisha attempted to storm PD headquarters; they were forcibly dispersed by police using tear gas and water cannons, leading to several injuries. In December, Berisha was physically attacked while leading an antigovernment protest; the assailant was quickly arrested.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) generally function without restriction but have limited funding due to dependence on foreign donors.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers are constitutionally allowed to organize and bargain collectively, and most have the right to strike. However, effective collective bargaining remains limited, and union members have little protection against discrimination by employers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, but corruption remains a serious problem, underfunded courts are subject to political pressure and influence, and public trust in judicial institutions is low.

In 2021, the Assembly adopted amendments to 10 laws in an effort to strengthen judicial efficiency. International governance bodies praised the subsequent reevaluation of judges and prosecutors via judicial vetting mechanisms. All priority cases had been reviewed by that September; more than 60 percent of all cases reviewed had resulted in dismissals "due to unexplained assets." The vetting process continued in 2022; in April, Tirana chief prosecutor Elizabeta Imeraj was dismissed over concerns regarding her family's assets.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are upheld inconsistently. Trial procedures can be affected by corruption and are sometimes closed to the public. Although the state is supposed to offer free legal aid, legal counsel is not always provided to those who cannot afford their own. A number of local NGOs offer free legal aid for those affected.

Reports of police abuse of detainees continue. Prison inmates suffer from poor living conditions and inadequate medical treatment. Drug-related crime remains a problem, as Albania is a transit country for heroin smugglers.

Tribal law is practiced in parts of northern Albania, and sometimes involves revenge killings.

The Roma community faces significant discrimination in education, health care, employment, and housing.

A 2010 law bars discrimination based on race and several other categories, including sexual orientation and gender identity, and a 2013 reform of the criminal code introduced protections against hate crimes and hate speech based on sexual orientation and gender identity. A May 2022 pride parade in Tirana attracted significant support. However, anti-LGBT+ bias persists.

Women are underrepresented in the workforce. Women living in rural areas have fewer opportunities for employment and education.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Albanians generally enjoy freedom of movement, though criminal activity and practices related to historically predominant honor codes limit these rights in some areas. People are generally free to change their place of residence or employment. Access to government documents is affected by bribery.

Numerous property restitution cases related to communist-era confiscations remain unresolved. Illegal construction is a major problem, as is bribery linked to government approval of development projects. Women continue to face serious challenges to fair and equal property inheritance from parents as well as when divorcing their husbands.

The government generally does not place explicit restrictions on social freedoms, though same-sex marriages are not recognized.

Domestic violence is widespread. Police are poorly equipped to handle cases of domestic violence or spousal rape, which is often not understood to be a crime.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Albania has relatively robust labor laws but lacks the capacity to enforce workplace safety and other protections. Conditions in the manufacturing, construction, and mining sectors are often substandard and put workers at risk.

While Albania continues to struggle with human trafficking, authorities are proactive in addressing the issue. In recent years, the government has cooperated with civil society leaders, creating an advisory board on trafficking and increasing victim assistance in criminal proceedings.

Algeria

Population: 44,900,000
Capital: Algiers
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Political affairs in Algeria have long been dominated by a closed elite based in the military and the ruling party, the National Liberation Front (FLN). While there are multiple opposition parties in Parliament, elections are distorted by fraud, and electoral processes are not transparent. Other concerns include the suppression of street protests, legal restrictions on media freedom, and rampant corruption. The Hirak protest movement in 2019 put pressure on the regime to reform, but a crackdown on dissent in the following years has prevented large-scale demonstrations from continuing.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Mohamed Benhalima, a dissident and whistleblower who fled the country in 2019 after participating in the Hirak protests, was extradited to Algeria from Spain on dubious terrorism charges in March. Benhalima was sentenced to 12 years in prison in August, but additional charges remained pending; according to some reports, he was also sentenced to death by a military court on charges including "espionage."
- The government continued to crack down on other activists and groups linked to the Hirak movement throughout the year. Numerous opposition figures were subjected to arbitrary arrest and prosecution under vaguely worded terrorism laws.
- In December, the authorities closed the critical media outlet Radio M after security forces raided its offices and arrested its editor in chief, Ihsane el-Kadi. He was charged with threatening national security and "receiving suspicious funding from foreign sources."

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 10 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president, who is directly elected for five-year terms, remains the dominant figure in the executive branch, though some authority was shifted to the prime minister under constitutional reforms adopted in 2020.

A two-term limit has been in effect since 2016, but it did not apply to the prior terms of longtime president Abdelaziz Bouteflika, whose plans to seek a fifth consecutive term sparked the Hirak protests in 2019. Bouteflika resigned that April after losing the support of the armed forces.

Former prime minister Abdelmajid Tebboune won the December 2019 presidential election with 58 percent of the vote. Abdelaziz Belaïd of the Future Front, the only candidate who had not served in cabinet posts under Bouteflika, won 7 percent. Voter turnout was reportedly as low as 20 percent. Protesters called the election a sham and orchestrated a boycott. Outside observers were not allowed to enter the country to monitor the poll.

The president nominates the prime minister after consulting with the parliamentary majority. Tebboune appointed then finance minister Ayman Benabderrahmane as prime minister in 2021.

The 407 members of the National People's Assembly, the lower house of Parliament, are directly elected to five-year terms, which can only be renewed once under the 2020 constitutional reforms. In early elections held in 2021, the ruling FLN won 98 seats, while the allied National Democratic Rally (RND) took 58. The Islamist Movement of Society for Peace (MSP) won 65 seats, the Future Front captured 48, and the moderate Islamist National Construction Movement (El-Binaa) took 39. No other party won more than 10 seats, though 84 independent lawmakers were elected.

The MSP and El-Binaa alleged that the elections were marred by fraud, while Hirak supporters boycotted the polls. Nationwide turnout stood at 23 percent. The Independent National Authority for Elections (ANIE) reported that over 360 polling facilities were shuttered due to looting and other disruptions.

The president appoints one-third of the members of the upper house, the Council of the Nation, which has 144 members serving six-year terms. The other two-thirds are indirectly elected by local and provincial assemblies. Half of the chamber's mandates are renewed every three years. Partial upper house elections took place in February 2022. The FLN took the most seats, securing 25, while independents took 14, RND took 11, and the Future Front and the Socialist Forces Front (FFS) took 5 and 2 seats, respectively.

Local and regional elections were held amid low turnout in 2021. The FLN and RND won the most town council seats and a plurality of regional assembly seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Prior to 2019, Algeria's elections were administered by the Interior Ministry and were often subject to government interference. Pressure from protesters ultimately forced the government to establish the ANIE. However, the slate of approved presidential candidates that was announced ahead of the 2019 presidential election was dominated by Bouteflika-era officials, raising doubts about the efficacy of the electoral reforms. The absence of international election monitors drew criticism from Algerian civil society.

Constitutional reforms were adopted through a 2020 referendum that was marred by low voter turnout. Reform-package opponents, including Hirak activists, had called for a boycott after being prevented from campaigning or airing their views on state media.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 4 / 16

The Interior Ministry must approve political parties before they can operate legally. Parties cannot form along explicitly ethnic lines. The Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), which swept the 1990 local and 1991 national elections that preceded Algeria's decade-long civil war, remains banned. Since the Hirak emerged in 2019, the authorities have intensified their repression of opposition groups, especially parties espousing separatism, Islamist groups, and parties perceived as closely aligned with the Hirak.

In January 2022, the Council of State suspended the opposition Socialist Workers' Party (PST) for allegedly failing to organize its annual congress within the legally mandated timeframe.

In recent years, authorities have increasingly used vaguely worded antiterrorism legislation to prosecute members of the opposition. In 2021, the High Security Council designated the Rachad—an organization that includes former FIS members—and the Movement for the Self-Determination of Kabylie (MAK) as terrorist organizations. Numerous people accused of affiliation with the groups have since faced arrest. In November 2022, exiled MAK leader Ferhat Mehenni was sentenced in absentia to life in prison on terrorism-related charges.

Opposition parties play a marginal role in Parliament, and their campaigns are regularly curtailed by the government. Election boycotts by opposition groups are not uncommon.

Opposition leaders have also been subject to detention and prosecution. In January 2022, an Algiers court sentenced Democratic and Social Movement (MDS) leader Fethi Ghares to two years' imprisonment and a 200,000 dinar ($1,400) fine on charges including "offending public bodies."

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The military retains its long-standing influence over civilian politics. Its vast resources and lack of public accountability have helped shape its role as the most powerful political actor in Algeria.

Allegations and scandals involving corruption in the selection of political candidates, as well as vote-buying during elections, have surfaced in recent years. After Bouteflika stepped down in 2019, the authorities initiated an anticorruption campaign targeting entrepreneurs and officials who were accused of exercising improper influence on political decisions under the former administration.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

No specific ethnic or religious group dominates the main state institutions, which tend to include both Arab and Amazigh (Berber) officials. Kabylie-based parties associated with the Amazigh community, like the Rally for Culture and Democracy and the FFS, have controlled a small number of municipalities, but their activities are often curtailed by the military. Some Amazigh activists have been targeted by the authorities for mobilizing in support of their political interests.

Women remain reluctant to run for office, are often unable to secure meaningful influence within Parliament, and are more likely to lose intraparty debates. Women won only 8 percent of the seats in the 2021 lower house elections.

LGBT+ people are politically marginalized and have little practical ability to advocate for their political interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

The military has historically served as the ultimate arbiter of policy disputes in Algeria, and elected leaders have relied on its support to maintain office. The loss of military backing played a significant role in Bouteflika's resignation in 2019. The army chief of staff continues to wield considerable influence over the administration of President Tebboune.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Inadequate anticorruption laws, a lack of official transparency, low levels of judicial independence, and bloated bureaucracies contribute to widespread corruption at all levels of government. Anticorruption investigations that do occur are often used to settle scores between factions within the regime. The constitutional reforms passed in 2020 included provisions for a transparency and anticorruption authority, as well as a ban on combining roles in public office and private business.

A number of Bouteflika's former political and economic allies have received harsh prison sentences as part of the anticorruption campaign that followed his resignation. In August 2022, former prime minister Noureddine Bedoui was detained in connection with a corruption investigation. In December, former finance minister Mohamed Loukal, who first came under scrutiny in 2019, was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment on corruption charges.

Whistleblowers have few legal protections, and those safeguards that exist often go unenforced in practice. Several high-profile whistleblowers have faced retaliation from the government in recent years. In March 2022, Mohamed Benhalima, a former army officer who fled the country in 2019 after participating in the Hirak protests, was extradited to Algeria from Spain on dubious charges related to his purported involvement with the banned Rachad movement. While living abroad, Benhalima had publicly exposed corruption within the military through his posts on social media. He faced at least 30 charges for his activism, and was sentenced to 12 years in prison on an initial set of three charges in August. Some human rights organizations reported that Benhalima was also sentenced to death by a military court on charges of "espionage and desertion."

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Algeria lacks access-to-information legislation. There is considerable opacity surrounding official decision-making procedures, the publication of official acts is rarely timely, and rules on asset disclosure by government officials are weak and poorly enforced. The 2020 constitutional revision introduced a requirement for all appointed and elected officials to declare their assets at the beginning and end of their terms, and obliges the public administration to justify its decisions within a time period to be determined by law. While the revised constitution nominally guarantees the right to access information, it includes vague exceptions for "the rights of others, the legitimate interests of businesses, and the requirements of national security."

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 22 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Although some newspapers are privately owned and some journalists remain aggressive in their coverage of government affairs, most papers rely on government agencies for printing and advertising, encouraging self-censorship. Authorities sometimes block distribution of independent news outlets that are based abroad or online. Viewers can access unlicensed private television channels that are located in Algeria but legally based abroad, though these are subject to government crackdowns.

A 2020 law criminalized "fake news" that undermines public order and security; offenders can receive one- to five-year prison sentences. News sites must be directed by

Algerian nationals and based physically in Algeria, report income sources, and keep an archive of at least six months. Foreign-language websites must be approved by a special authority. In September 2022, the government unveiled a bill that, if approved, would prevent newspapers from receiving any funding from abroad or from "suspicious sources."

Authorities use these and other legal mechanisms to restrict media activity. A number of media outlets were shuttered in 2022, including the independent French-language newspaper Liberté, which reportedly closed due to political pressure. In December, authorities closed Radio M—one of the last remaining critical media outlets in Algeria—after security forces raided its offices and arrested Ihsane el-Kadi, its editor in chief. El-Kadi, who has been arrested in connection with his work several times in recent years, was charged with threatening national security and "receiving suspicious funding from foreign sources."

Journalists and bloggers are frequently subjected to harassment, including brief detentions and fines for offenses such as defamation and "undermining national unity." Journalists covering demonstrations or who are close to the Hirak have been arbitrarily arrested and interrogated; several of these incidents were reported in 2022. In one case in January, journalist Merzoug Touati was sentenced to a year in prison for "spreading false information" after writing an article condemning the conditions in which a detained activist was being held.

Foreign outlets are also subject to government interference. In 2021, the government withdrew France 24's authorization to operate in Algeria, alleging that the French state-owned broadcaster engaged in "repeated hostility" toward national institutions.

Algeria's population is overwhelmingly Sunni Muslim. Members of religious minorities, including Christians and non-Sunni Muslims, suffer from state persecution and interference. Authorities have cracked down on the small Ahmadi community, claiming that its members denigrate Islam, threaten national security, and violate laws on associations. In June 2022, 18 Ahmadis were charged in Béjaïa with participating in "an unauthorized group" and "denigrating Islam." In a September trial, three were sentenced to a year in prison, and the remaining 15 were fined and sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

Religious communities may only gather to worship at state-approved locations. Accusations of nonbelief or blasphemy can draw criminal punishments. Proselytizing by non-Muslims is illegal.

In September 2022, authorities requested that that the Algerian branch of Caritas, a charitable organization affiliated with the Roman Catholic Church, cease operating in the country. The government did not provide an explanation, but local sources reported that the request was likely made because the government considered Caritas to be a foreign organization.

Authorities have engaged in a crackdown on the Algerian Protestant Church (EPA) since 2017, though the EPA had been legally recognized in 1974. In April 2022, a Protestant church in Tizi Ouzou Province was closed following an order from the governor, becoming the 17th Protestant church to be closed since 2017.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Authorities generally do not interfere directly with the operations of universities, but debate is circumscribed in practice due to restrictive laws that limit speech more broadly. Academic work is also affected by state censorship of domestically published and imported books. Student organizations were active in the Hirak, with members calling for political reforms. The authorities occasionally resorted to violence to suppress these demonstrations.

Private discussion and the public expression of personal views are relatively unhindered when they do not focus on certain sensitive topics, but social media users are subject to prosecution for critical comments that touch on the government or religion. The government monitors internet activity in the name of national security and does not disclose information about the program's targets or range, which is thought to be extensive.

The authorities are known to prosecute social media users, particularly Hirak supporters. A Hirak activist, Hakim Debbazi, was arrested in February 2022, allegedly for posting pro-Hirak information on Facebook. Debbazi died in pretrial detention in April, after a court rejected a request that he be released due to his deteriorating health.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Legal restrictions on freedom of assembly remain in place but are inconsistently enforced. Though the Hirak protests that began in 2019 were sometimes tolerated, the authorities frequently used force and arbitrary arrests to preempt or disrupt rallies.

Hirak protesters faced increasing repression after demonstrations resumed in 2021, causing the movement to lose momentum; large-scale Hirak protests did not return in 2022. However, police continued to arrest individuals alleged to have ties to the movement during the year.

Other antigovernment demonstrations continued in 2022 and were met with repression by the authorities. In April, security forces dispersed a demonstration commemorating past pro-Amazigh protest movements, arresting several participants.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

The 2012 law on associations effectively restricts the formation, funding, and activities of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). Permits and receipts of application submission are required to establish and operate NGOs, but organizations often face considerable delays and bureaucratic obstacles when attempting to obtain such documents, leaving them in a legally precarious position.

The authorities have targeted human rights activists who are close to the Hirak and the political opposition. In February 2022, activist Faleh Hammoudi was sentenced to three years in prison and a 100,000 dinar ($700) fine on charges including running an "unregistered association," due to his work heading a chapter of the Algerian League for the Defense of Human Rights (LADDH).

NGOs must notify the government of staffing changes and submit detailed reports on their funding; those that accept foreign funding without government approval risk fines or imprisonment of staff.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The country's main labor federation, the General Union of Algerian Workers (UGTA), has been criticized for its close relationship to the government and for its failure to advocate for workers' interests.

Workers require government approval to establish new unions. This is difficult to obtain in practice, leaving many unions without legal status. Authorities routinely clamp down on independent unions. The Autonomous National Union of Electricity and Gas Workers (SNATEG), an independent union that represents public utility workers, has been repeatedly harassed by the authorities in recent years.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is susceptible to pressure from the civilian government and the military. Judges are appointed by the High Council of the Judiciary (CSM), which is headed by the president, although the 2020 constitutional reforms removed the justice minister and attorney general from the body. Two representatives of the judges' union and the chair of the National Human Rights Council were added.

Concerns regarding the judiciary's independence persist despite these reforms. In 2021, the CSM expelled Sadedin Merzoug, a Hirak supporter, from the judiciary for expressing prodemocracy views, claiming that he had obstructed justice and violated his duty of confidentiality.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The lack of judicial and prosecutorial independence often erodes the due process rights of defendants, particularly in politically sensitive cases against former officials or civic activists. Lengthy delays in bringing defendants to trial are common, and prosecutors' requests to extend pretrial detention periods are typically granted. Security forces frequently conduct warrantless searches and engage in arbitrary arrests and short-term detentions. According to the National Committee for the Release of Detainees (CNLD), more than 300 political prisoners were being held as of April 2022, many in pretrial detention.

In October 2022, Hirak activist Abdelhamid Bouziza was forcibly disappeared after being arrested by security forces. He was found 20 days later, in detention nearly 300 miles from where he was arrested. In a similar case, Slimane Bouhafs, an Algerian refugee in Tunisia, was abducted and forcibly disappeared by unidentified men in August 2021; he was located four days later in Algerian custody. Bouhafs was sentenced in December 2022 to three years in prison and a 100,000 dinar ($700) fine after being accused of ties to the MAK. The exact circumstances of his forced return to Algeria remained unclear.

A 2006 reconciliation law gave immunity to Islamist and state perpetrators of serious crimes during the civil war, while compensating families of those who were subject to such crimes, which included forced disappearances. The reconciliation law also criminalized public discussion on the fate of the disappeared.

Allegations of torture have decreased since the civil war's end, but human rights activists still accuse the police of using excessive force and abusing detainees. In August 2022, pro-Hirak activist and whistleblower Mohamed Benhalima reported that he had been tortured in pretrial detention.

Prison conditions are poor, with some inmates reportedly facing significant overcrowding and poor sanitation.

Terrorist groups, including Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and the Islamic State (IS) militant group, continue to operate in Algeria. However, attacks have grown less frequent in recent years.

Officials have made gradual efforts to address the Amazigh community's cultural demands. Tamazight, the Berber language, became a national language in 1995, allowing it to be taught officially in schools serving Amazigh areas. Tamazight received the status of an official language nationwide through a 2016 constitutional amendment, meaning it could be used in administrative documents. The 2020 constitutional revisions made it impossible to change the status of Tamazight as a national language. However, Arabic remains the prevailing language of government.

The constitution guarantees gender equality, but women continue to face both legal and societal discrimination. Many women receive lower wages than men in similar positions, and there are few women in company leadership posts. Sexual harassment, while punishable with fines and jail time, is nevertheless common in workplaces. NGOs dedicated to women's rights have become more vocal as part of the Hirak, calling for a renewed commitment to the constitutional promise of gender equality.

LGBT+ people face discrimination and violence, and many LGBT+ activists have fled the country. Same-sex sexual activity is punishable with prison sentences as long as two years. LGBT+ Algerians face mistreatment at the hands of police and discrimination by health care providers and employers.

About 175,000 Sahrawis from Western Sahara live in refugee camps near the border with Morocco. The camps have been present since 1975, in a remote desert region with limited job opportunities. About 90,000 of the residents are considered "vulnerable" by the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), as they rely on humanitarian assistance for food, water, and education.

Sub-Saharan African migrants, including refugees and asylum seekers, are subject to racial discrimination in Algeria and are often arbitrarily arrested and deported from the country—or simply abandoned at the southern desert borders—without being given the opportunity to challenge the actions in court. In September 2022 alone, more than 1,500 sub-Saharan migrants were expelled from Algeria and left at the border with Niger.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

While most citizens are relatively free to travel domestically and abroad, the authorities closely monitor and limit access to visas for non-Algerians. Men of military draft age cannot leave the country without official consent. The land border between Algeria and Morocco remains closed. Police reportedly limit the movement of sub-Saharan African migrants attempting to reach the Mediterranean coast. Married women younger than 18 must obtain the permission of their husbands to travel abroad.

The government has at times banned Algerian diaspora activists from leaving the country. At least three Algerian-Canadian activists were temporarily prevented from leaving in 2022. All three were interrogated about their potential links to the Hirak, but were later able to return to Canada.

The government plays a dominant role in the economy, leaving little room for private competitors. Cronyism is also a major obstacle to private enterprise, with businesspeople who are not aligned with the regime often facing harassment by the authorities. Numerous regulations and their flawed implementation make Algeria one of the most difficult environments in the world in which to establish and operate a business. Inheritance rules favor men over women.

Women do not enjoy equal rights in marriage and divorce under the family code, which is based on Islamic law. Among other provisions, women must obtain a male guardian's permission to marry, and the father is the legal guardian of his children. No law addresses spousal rape.

Domestic violence is common, and the laws against it are weak; for example, cases can be dropped if the victim forgives the alleged abuser. Women's rights groups report that between 100 and 200 women are killed in domestic abuse incidents each year.

The weak rule of law, government involvement in the economy, and bureaucratic obstacles pose major barriers to economic opportunity and social mobility. Laws against unsafe or abusive working conditions are poorly enforced.

A 2009 law criminalized all forms of trafficking in persons, and Algeria reported its first conviction under the law in 2015. In recent years, the government has made an effort to enforce the ban through prosecutions and has provided protection for victims, though not systematically. Undocumented sub-Saharan African migrants are particularly susceptible to trafficking, including through debt bondage and sexual exploitation.

Andorra

Population: 80,000
Capital: Andorra la Vella
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Andorra has a parliamentary system of government and regularly holds free and fair elections. Political rights and civil liberties are generally respected. However, the country has strict naturalization criteria, and more than 50 percent of the population consists of noncitizens who do not have the right to vote. Among other outstanding concerns, abortion remains completely prohibited, and there is a notable wage gap between men and women. Andorra's small Muslim and Jewish communities lack dedicated cemeteries, and the country has no recognized mosque.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In July, the Andorran parliament approved a new family code; among other things, the new law provided for transgender people to be able to change their name and gender on legal documents and legalized same-sex marriage. However, in December, the Constitutional Court found the new law's distinction between religious and civil marriages to be unconstitutional, meaning that parts of the law must be amended before it can be enacted.

- In April, the parliament approved legislative reforms that banned conspicuous religious symbols—such as yarmulkes, hijabs, and large crosses—in public schools, which rights advocates have called discriminatory. In October, the government approved a decree providing students who are affected by the new legislation with the option to take classes online; in one case, a Muslim girl began taking online classes so that she would not be made to remove her headscarf in the classroom.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Andorra has a parliamentary system, with a prime minister elected by and accountable to the legislature. The legitimacy of the prime minister, usually the head of the party with the most seats, rests largely on the conduct of parliamentary elections, which have historically been competitive and credible. Xavier Espot Zamora, the new leader of the ruling Democrats for Andorra (DA) party, became prime minister in 2019 following that year's elections.

Two "co-princes," the French president and the Roman Catholic bishop of La Seu d'Urgell, Spain, serve jointly as Andorra's ceremonial heads of state.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the unicameral, 28-member Consell General are directly elected every four years through a mixed voting system. In the 2019 elections, the DA led with 11 seats, followed by the Social Democratic Party (PS) with 7, the Liberals of Andorra (LA) and the new conservative party Third Way (TV) with 4 each, and the new social-liberal party Committed Citizens (CC) with 2. The LA and CC joined the DA in a governing coalition. The polls were considered competitive, credible, and well-administered.

The Electoral Law, which was last changed in 2014 to introduce regulations on campaign finance, provides a sound framework for free and fair elections. The Electoral Board supervises elections impartially. However, the law does not provide a formal role for international or citizen observers.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

Political parties may form and operate freely, and there are a number of active parties in Andorra. Two new parties, TV and CC, made their debut in the 2019 elections.

The country has experienced multiple democratic transfers of power between rival parties, most recently in 2011, when the DA replaced a government led by the PS. Opposition parties are well represented in the Consell General and deprived the DA of its outright majority in the 2019 elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Citizens and political figures are generally able to make political choices without undue interference from external forces.

More than 50 percent of the population consists of noncitizens—mostly from nearby states—who do not have the right to vote in national elections or run for elected office. Under Andorra's restrictive naturalization criteria, one must marry a resident Andorran or live in the country for more than 20 years to qualify for citizenship. Prospective citizens are also required to learn Catalan, the national language.

Women are active in politics, and after the 2019 elections they held 50 percent of the seats in the legislature. LGBT+ people are also free to participate in politics, and several parties advocate for their interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

Elected representatives generally exercise their powers without improper influence from unelected or nonstate actors. However, in recent years the Vatican has threatened to ask the bishop of La Seu d'Urgell, Joan-Enric Vives i Sicília, to resign as co-prince if the Andorran government were to decriminalize abortion, a move that would likely cause a constitutional crisis. Similar threats were made in 2009 by the other co-prince, former French president Nicolas Sarkozy, who stated that he would resign if Andorra failed to reform its banking system. Neither co-prince is elected, directly or indirectly, by Andorran voters.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Government corruption is not viewed as a pressing issue in Andorra. Over the past several years, the government has made progress on financial-sector reforms designed to prevent abuses of the country's banking system that could facilitate domestic or transnational corruption. Nonresidents must make certain disclosures about their bank accounts. In 2021, Parliament approved a transparency law that requires its members to report conflicts of interests and declare their assets. Nevertheless, the Council of Europe (CoE)'s Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) noted in a 2021 report a lack of progress with other anticorruption legislation.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government operates openly in practice. Among other resources, it publishes a regular bulletin, accessible online, that documents government activity, budgetary processes, public procurement, and asset disclosures. Since 2017, the Ministry of Territorial Planning has sponsored a participatory budget process, allowing members of the public to help set spending priorities. A 2021 transparency law requires authorities to provide information on the remuneration of civil servants and senior officials, as well as on public tenders and contracts.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

There are several daily and weekly newspapers, and the country's only domestic television station is operated by the public broadcaster Ràdio i Televisió d'Andorra. Residents have access to a variety of foreign media services. While press freedom is generally respected, criminal defamation laws remain on the books, and business, political, and religious interests have historically influenced media coverage; reporting on the activities of Andorra's banks has been particularly difficult. The biggest media outlets are dependent on state advertising, which limits their opportunities to criticize the government.

Freedom of religion is generally upheld, but the Roman Catholic Church enjoys a privileged position that allows it to draw on some state support and bypass some bureaucratic processes that other faith groups must adhere to. In April 2022, the parliament amended the Education Law to ban conspicuous religious symbols—such as yarmulkes, hijabs, and large crosses—in public schools, which Amnesty International has called discriminatory. In October, the government approved a decree providing students who are affected by the new law with the option to take classes online. In one case, a Muslim girl began taking her classes online so that she would not be made to remove her headscarf in the classroom.

Despite years of negotiations between the Muslim community and the government, there is no recognized mosque for the country's roughly 2,000 Muslims. The government has organized meetings with Jewish and Muslim communities to discuss the possible establishment of a special cemetery where those groups could conduct burials according to their customs and beliefs, but little progress has been made.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no restrictions on academic freedom, and the educational system is free from indoctrination.

There are no significant constraints on personal expression or freedom of private discussion. Authorities are not known to illegally monitor private online communications. However, in 2020, authorities drew up three slander charges against activist Vanessa Mendoza Cortés, who advocated for safe abortions, which Amnesty International and other international human rights groups called an attack on freedom of expression. Two of the charges were dropped in June 2021, but Mendoza Cortés, whose trial had not yet occurred by the end of 2022, could still face a fine of 30,000 euros (approximately $32,775).

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Andorran law provides for freedom of assembly, and the government respects this right in practice. Demonstrations against government policies and in response to other social and political controversies take place on occasion. Authorities imposed temporary restrictions on large gatherings during 2020 to limit the spread of COVID-19.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Various nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) function without restriction. Human rights groups are generally able to publish their findings and advocate for improvements without repercussions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The right to unionize is protected by law and the constitution, and a new labor law that took effect in 2019 established regulations for collective bargaining and the right to strike. However, unions and the political opposition characterized the law as a setback, arguing in part that it placed unnecessary constraints on the right to strike and increased job insecurity. There are no laws in place to penalize antiunion discrimination.

In 2018, Andorra experienced its first major strike in 85 years when civil servants walked out to protest reforms to their contracts proposed by the government.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is impartial and independent and is generally free from pressure from the government. Judges are appointed and supervised by the Higher Council of Justice; the two co-princes, the speaker of parliament, and the prime minister each select one of the council's five members, and the fifth is elected by judges and magistrates.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Defendants enjoy the presumption of innocence and the right to a fair trial, and due process is generally upheld in the criminal justice system. The constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, but police can detain suspects for up to 48 hours without charge.

Andorra is free from war and insurgencies, violent crimes rates are low, and law enforcement agents are not known to use excessive force against civilians. Prison conditions are adequate.

Though the 2019 law on equal treatment and nondiscrimination focuses primarily on combating gender discrimination, it includes comprehensive protections against discrimination based on race, ethnicity, age, disability, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, and other such categories. The legislation provides enforcement mechanisms, including fines, and also seeks to address a persistent gender pay gap, estimated to be as high as 40 percent in some sectors. A report published by a women's rights organization in 2020 described ongoing problems including discrimination in the labor market and gender-based violence.

Andorra provides temporary protection and services to refugees and asylum seekers, but no law allows the government to grant asylum or refugee status.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are few restrictions on freedom of movement, and people are generally free to change their place of residence, employment, and education. The government imposed temporary restrictions on travel and internal movement during 2020 in response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

The legal and regulatory framework is generally supportive of property rights and entrepreneurship, and there are few undue obstacles to private business activity in practice.

Personal social freedoms are generally respected, though there are some restrictions for same-sex couples. In July 2022, the government adopted a comprehensive new family code that legalized civil marriage for same-sex couples, set to enter into force in 2023. However, in December, Andorra's Constitutional Court deemed the code's distinction between canonical and civil marriage to be discrimination "on the basis of religious convictions" and thus unconstitutional, meaning that parts of the law must be amended before entering into force. Among other things, the new law also permits no-fault divorce and allows transgender people to change their name and gender on legal documents.

Domestic violence is prohibited by law and punishable with prison sentences; the government pursues domestic violence cases and provides resources for victims. Nevertheless, such violence remains a serious problem, and sometimes involves violence against children. The CoE's 2020 report on Andorra's implementation of the Istanbul Convention—a treaty on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence—listed a number of shortcomings in the collection of data and the support system for victims of sexual violence.

Andorra remains one of the few countries in Europe where abortion is completely prohibited, with penalties for both doctors and patients who undergo the procedure. Abortion is relatively accessible in neighboring France and Spain, though this option can be expensive for Andorrans.

Andorran laws provide protections for most workers, including migrant workers. However, temporary workers must leave the country when their employment contract expires, exposing those with expired contracts to potential abuse by employers. The Labor Inspections Office is proactive in addressing violations of workers' rights.

A 2019 report from the CoE's Group of Experts on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings (GRETA) found that Andorra had made legislative and policy progress on combating trafficking but called on authorities to scrutinize high-risk sectors for possible victims and raise awareness of the threat among law enforcement bodies. Confirmed cases of trafficking have been rare in practice.

Angola

Population: 35,600,000
Capital: Luanda
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Angola has been ruled by the same party since independence, and authorities have systematically repressed political dissent. Corruption, due process violations, and abuses by security forces remain common. Some restrictions on the press and civil society were eased after President João Lourenço took office in 2017, but that partial opening has since been reversed.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- President Lourenço won a second term in August national elections that the opposition and independent civil society organizations criticized as deeply flawed. Military and police forces maintained a highly visible presence on the streets to suppress protests during the postelection period.
- In the months leading up to the elections, the authorities disrupted assemblies and civil society activity. Two well-known activists were arrested in January and remained in detention at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 10 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12

There is no separate election for the president, either by voters or by the legislature. Under the 2010 constitution, the head of the national list of the political party that receives the most votes in legislative elections automatically becomes president, without any parliamentary confirmation process. Despite this lack of an individual mandate, the constitution permits the president to unilaterally appoint and dismiss the vice president, cabinet, and provincial governors, among other important powers. The president may serve up to two five-year terms.

The intraparty procedures for choosing presidential candidates are not competitive. At a December 2021 congress of the ruling Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), incumbent president João Lourenço was confirmed as the head of the party's 2022 electoral list, receiving 98 percent of the votes from party delegates; there were no other nominees. He then secured a new presidential term after the MPLA won the August 2022 parliamentary elections. Lourenço had similarly faced no opponents at a 2016 party congress that set the stage for his first presidential term.

Members of the 220-seat, unicameral National Assembly are elected to five-year terms by proportional representation.

In the August 2022 elections, the MPLA won 51.2 percent of the vote and 124 seats, while the opposition National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) and its coalition took 44.0 percent and 90 seats. Three smaller parties won the remainder.

The African Union Election Observation Mission reported that the elections were generally peaceful, but noted limits on the right of access to information and freedom of the press as well as reports of an uneven playing field. Civil society organizations found that biased progovernment media, deficiencies in voter registration processes, and the MPLA's use of public resources in its campaign disadvantaged the opposition. The observation mission of the Community of Portuguese-Speaking Countries, while praising some aspects of the process, pointed to the fact that voter lists contained many deceased individuals.

A legal complaint in which UNITA and other opposition parties challenged the election results was rejected by the MPLA-controlled Constitutional Court in September. Opposition lawmakers took up their seats in the National Assembly but vowed to continue questioning the results.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The law states that the makeup of the National Election Commission (CNE) should reflect the disposition of power in the National Assembly, which gives an advantage to the MPLA. Voter registration is carried out by the government through its Ministry of Territorial Administration. Ahead of the 2022 elections, the voter list was audited to assess its integrity, but stakeholders raised concerns about a lack of transparency in the audit firm's appointment and findings. The CNE is legally required to disclose voter lists for each polling station at least 30 days prior to election day, but it failed to comply with this provision in 2022.

Articles 11 and 27 of the Law on Elections Observation empowered the CNE to limit the number of national and international observers, and it set a ceiling of 2,000 national observers for the 2022 elections, further undermining electoral transparency.

A joint statement signed by civil society groups and delivered to the CNE in August pointed to irregularities in electoral preparations. After the elections, civil society observers also cited failures to display voter lists and publish summary minutes at many polling stations. The final results were reportedly disclosed without prior notification of political parties, in violation of the law; UNITA said it had been excluded from the disclosure process.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16

While there is a multiparty system in place, competition is limited. The process for creating new political parties is fraught with bureaucratic obstacles and attempts at co-optation, factors that severely hinder public confidence in new parties.

Citing irregularities in the process, the Constitutional Court in 2020 rejected the legalization of a new opposition party, PRA-JA Servir Angola, led by Abel Chivukuvuku. The decision also placed limits on the ability of Chivukuvuku and the party's other promoters to attempt to establish a new, different party ahead of the 2022 elections.

Separately, the Constitutional Court ruled in October 2021 that the election of Adalberto da Costa Jr. as UNITA party leader in 2019 had been illegal. Delegates at a UNITA party congress in December 2021 then reelected Costa as their leader; he ran unopposed and took more than 96 percent of the votes.

The MPLA has governed without interruption since Angola secured independence in 1975, and the country has never experienced a transfer of power between rival parties. However, opposition parties have been building public support in recent years, and the UNITA-led coalition increased its representation by 39 seats in the 2022 elections; the MPLA lost 26 seats.

The authorities have repeatedly postponed plans to hold the country's first-ever municipal elections, and no such balloting was held during 2022. Some analysts have argued that the administration is reluctant to relinquish its power to appoint subnational officials, as it would risk giving the opposition an opportunity to win office and demonstrate an ability to govern.

MPLA-aligned economic oligarchies nurture a system of dependency and patronage that can subvert candidates' and voters' ability to freely express their political choices.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

While societal pressures can discourage women from active political participation, women's rights advocates have an increasingly vocal presence in political life. Women held 74 seats in the National Assembly after the 2022 elections, and members elected the body's first woman speaker in September.

Government and state institutions are controlled by the MPLA, which draws much of its support from the Kimbundu ethnic group. The Ovimbundo and Kikongo ethnicities are predominant, respectively, in UNITA and the National Liberation Front of Angola (FNLA).

Issues affecting LGBT+ people have historically been excluded from political debate. This changed somewhat with the parliament's 2019 adoption of a new penal code that decriminalized same-sex relations.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Governmental power is highly centralized in the presidency. The president is able to legislate by decree on key subjects without public discussion, and Lourenço regularly does so in practice. The National Assembly, which remains under the control of the ruling MPLA, acts largely as a rubber stamp in approving the president's policies.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

After decades of MPLA rule, corruption and patronage have become entrenched in nearly all segments of public and private life. A few high-profile associates of former president José Eduardo dos Santos have been convicted of corruption in recent years, including his son, José Filomeno dos Santos, whose 2020 guilty verdict was upheld by the Supreme Court in 2021. The former president's daughter, Isabel dos Santos, has been accused of siphoning public funds from the state oil firm, Sonangol; she was ordered to return $500 million in shares to the company by an international arbitration court in 2021. However, senior officials who are not directly connected to the family of former president dos Santos have rarely been brought to trial.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government operations are generally opaque. In 2018, the government announced the formation of the National Oil, Gas, and Biofuels Agency (ANPG) to oversee the industry beginning in 2019. However, its leadership was drawn from that of Sonangol.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 18 / 60 (−2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The Angolan state owns most media in the country, and such outlets report favorably on the government, rarely carrying critical coverage. Most ostensibly private outlets also act as mouthpieces of the regime. However, content produced by foreign news agencies is widely consumed.

Insult and defamation are considered criminal offenses. Journalists accused of engaging in incitement, hate speech, defense of fascist or racist ideologies, or dissemination of "fake news" can be charged with "abuse of press freedom." Government officials regularly file criminal complaints as well as civil lawsuits against members of the press in practice. Journalists also face physical violence in the course of their work, with several assaults reported during 2022.

The constitution guarantees religious freedom, but the government imposes onerous criteria on religious groups for official recognition, which is required for the legal construction of houses of worship. Many Pentecostal churches remain unregistered.

There are no registered Muslim groups, though Muslim communities have been vocal in their demands for recognition and the right to worship freely.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academics must maintain a façade of agreement with the MPLA's preferred narratives and refrain from open criticism of the party, or risk losing their positions. Those who voice dissent are often monitored by security services.

Fear of retribution for expressing criticism of the government or controversial opinions in private conversations persists in Angola, and self-censorship is common. Known surveillance of civil society groups, journalists, and academics can leave ordinary citizens reluctant to speak out. The government actively monitors online activity.

Opposition parties' youth organizations claim that repression of political dissent has increased in recent years, citing several instances of arbitrary arrests and intimidation of government critics by state security forces.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12 (−2)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly are poorly upheld. While the Lourenço administration initially showed more tolerance for public demonstrations than its predecessor, peaceful marches are still frequently met with arrests and violence by the security forces, at times resulting in the deaths of protesters.

Authorities broke up or prevented planned protests on multiple occasions in 2022, both before and after the August elections. In April, for example, police in the capital disrupted a protest calling for free and fair elections and the release of political prisoners, arresting 22 people for disobeying police orders. Two organizers were convicted and made to pay fines, but the rest were acquitted.

In September, police prevented a demonstration against election fraud on the outskirts of Luanda and arrested three people after they were interviewed by reporters at the scene. Several others were detained or chased away by officers as they passed by. There were also reports that civic activists had been arrested at their homes. The army and police generally maintained a heavy and visible security presence on the streets in the wake of the August elections, contributing to a climate of fear that may have further deterred assembly.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that work on human rights and governance issues are closely monitored. The MPLA has historically made vocal attempts to discredit their work and sometimes threatened such groups with lawsuits and outright closure, prompting many to curtail their activities.

Ahead of the August 2022 elections, authorities worked to prevent planned civil society meetings from taking place. In May, for example, police physically blocked two NGOs from hosting a conference on peacebuilding. In September, authorities announced the arrest of 12 civic activists for "financing and promoting the dissemination" of videos on social media to "sow insecurity, hatred, and panic among the population." They were released without charge after several days of detention.

Two prominent activists who were arrested in January remained in detention at year's end. Luther Campos was arrested for promoting a socioeconomic protest by taxi drivers and was still awaiting trial as of December. Gilson da Silva Moreira was then arrested after attempting to publicize the harsh conditions of Campos's confinement; he received a suspended prison sentence of one year and three months in October, but he continued to be held pending an appeal.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because authorities disrupted civil society events and arrested activists to suppress dissent ahead of national elections.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4 (−1)

Certain employees who provide services considered essential—including prison guards and firefighters, but also workers in the oil sector—may not legally strike. Unions not associated with the MPLA have faced interference and harassment.

In May 2022, police intervened in a strike over pay and working conditions at the construction site for a hydroelectric dam in Kwanza Norte Province, killing at least three workers. According to the NGO Friends of Angola, several other workers were injured, and some were illegally detained inside the facilities of the construction firm, China Gezhouba Group Corporation. The authorities accused the strikers of vandalizing equipment and threatening Chinese citizens. State media reported in June that the government had brokered a new contract between the two sides, though it was unclear whether the agreement was freely negotiated or properly implemented.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because a strike by workers constructing a hydroelectric dam was met with police violence, resulting in at least three deaths.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The president appoints Supreme Court judges to life terms without legislative input. Corruption and political pressure from the MPLA contribute to the judiciary's general inefficacy and undermine its independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are poorly upheld. Many defendants are unable to afford legal counsel, and the state largely fails to provide qualified legal aid to those who need it. Arbitrary arrest and lengthy pretrial detention remain problems. Due process violations have been reported in recent cases involving political activists who seek autonomy or independence for the provinces of Cabinda and Lunda Norte.

Security forces enjoy impunity for violent acts, including torture and extrajudicial killings committed against detainees, activists, protesters, and others. Angolan prisons are reported to be overcrowded, unhygienic, lacking in necessities, and plagued by sexual abuse. According to government statistics, violent crime, including robberies, assaults, and homicides, has increased in Luanda in recent years.

The low-level separatist insurgency in Cabinda continues to pose a security threat. The Front for the Liberation of the Enclave of Cabinda (FLEC) claims to have engaged in guerrilla activity against Angolan soldiers, but the government typically does not confirm these claims.

Women face discrimination in the workplace that makes it difficult for them to rise to senior positions. There have been reports of abuse of women and children who are accused of practicing witchcraft.

In 2019 the parliament decriminalized same-sex sexual relations and banned discrimination based on sexual orientation, though enforcement is reportedly inadequate. There are no specific protections against bias based on gender identity.

Seminomadic Khoi and San tribes in the country's southern provinces have often suffered from neglect by the government and a lack of access to services, particularly in the context of prolonged droughts and the COVID-19 pandemic.

Security forces allegedly harass and abuse immigrant communities, and the government has failed to adequately protect refugees and asylum seekers. UN representatives expressed concern about the forced expulsion of Congolese migrants in 2020, suggesting that it violated international directives on the treatment of refugees.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Several organizations have been working to remove land mines that were placed during Angola's 1975–2002 civil war. The mines inhibit agriculture, construction, and freedom of movement, particularly in rural areas.

There have been reports by local NGOs that the authorities and private security groups guarding Lunda Norte Province's diamond mines restrict the movements of local residents.

The process for securing entry and exit visas remains difficult and mired in corruption. Bribes are frequently required in order to obtain employment and residence.

Predatory elites tend to either disrupt or co-opt emerging new businesses. Authorities have at times expropriated land and demolished homes without providing compensation. Customary law practices can leave women with unequal inheritance rights.

While residents enjoy some freedom with respect to personal status issues like marriage and divorce, child marriage remains common, particularly in rural areas. Same-sex marriage is not recognized. Domestic violence is widespread in Angola, and perpetrators are rarely prosecuted.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Public oil revenues are not equitably distributed or used to benefit the entire population. Rural regions in particular have inadequate infrastructure and access to services, leading to inequities in economic opportunity.

Child labor is a major problem, and foreign workers are vulnerable to sex trafficking and forced labor in the construction and mining industries. The authorities have failed to effectively investigate human trafficking or prosecute offenders.

Antigua and Barbuda

Population: 100,000
Capital: St. John's
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Antigua and Barbuda is a democracy that holds regular elections. Corruption in government is a concern, and women and LGBT+ people are underrepresented in politics and experience some discrimination. In 2017, Hurricane Irma devastated Barbuda: the entire island was evacuated, and many residents lost their livelihoods. The government has since sought to weaken the island's longstanding system of communal land rights. The country's citizenship-by-investment program is a key element of its economy, but its operation has come under international scrutiny.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, Antigua and Barbuda's final appellate court, the UK-based Privy Council, rejected a challenge to the Paradise Found Act 2015, which the appellants argued violated their constitutional right of "protection from deprivation of property" and infringed on communal land rights in Barbuda. The ruling raised concerns among Barbudans about environmental harms and erosion of property rights associated with plans for greater development on the island.

- In July, the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court ruled that elements of the country's Sexual Offences Act were unconstitutional, effectively abolishing the criminal prohibition of same-sex sexual relations. The court also held that a constitutional prohibition on sex discrimination also bans discrimination based on "gender identity, sexual character, and sexual orientation."
- In May, the government ratified the International Labour Organization's Violence and Harassment Convention. The document recognizes the right to go to work without experiencing violence and harassment, with an emphasis on abuses experienced by women in the workplace. It also recognizes the effects of domestic violence on women's ability to work.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The country's 1981 constitution establishes a parliamentary system, with a governor general representing the British monarch as ceremonial head of state. The prime minister is the head of government and is typically the leader of the majority party elected to Parliament. The Antigua and Barbuda Labour Party (ABLP) leader Gaston Browne maintained his position as prime minister after his party won a majority in the 2018 parliamentary elections.

The bicameral parliament is composed of a 17-seat Senate, whose members are appointed by the governor general, and the House of Representatives, whose 17 members are directly elected in single-seat constituencies, by means of a simple majority; representatives serve five-year terms.

The governing ABLP took 59 percent of the total vote and won 15 constituencies in the 2018 elections. The main opposition United Progressive Party (UPP) took 37 percent of the vote, but only one constituency. Observers deemed the polls generally competitive and credible. The Barbuda Council also holds regular elections.

A3. the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair and are implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies. However, since 1984, the electoral boundaries of Antigua and Barbuda have shifted only slightly, which has created a significant disparity in the range of constituency sizes: from 1,138 (St. Phillip South) to 4,878 (St. George).

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

Political parties can organize and operate freely. While there are several small political parties in the country, elections have been won by either the ABLP or the UPP since 1994. The first-past-the-post electoral system makes it very difficult for smaller, less well-established parties to gain representation in the House of Representatives.

There are realistic opportunities for opposition parties to increase their support or gain power through elections. Power has alternated frequently between the ABLP and UPP.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from the influence of nondemocratic actors. However, a lack of transparency for party and campaign financing has given rise to concerns about the potential influence of unknown domestic and foreign interests over political candidates. The most significant case was that of R. Allen Stanford, a US citizen who was an influential figure in Antigua, and established a bank in the country from which he ran a multibillion-dollar Ponzi scheme.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women are underrepresented in politics, and only two women were elected to the House of Representatives in 2018. LGBT+ people are marginalized and face discrimination, impacting their ability to engage fully in political processes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The elected prime minister, cabinet, and parliament determine government policies. There are some concerns about the influence of businesses on policymaking.

Tensions between the central government and residents and representatives from Barbuda have grown as the government has sought to weaken the Barbuda Land Act of 2007, which guaranteed that land on Barbuda was communally owned by Barbudans and that their consent was required for its purchase and development. The Barbuda Council has resisted the Browne government's plans to develop the island. In 2020, the Council called for the secession of Barbuda, while the government accused the Council of treason and threatened to remove it from the country's constitution.

Government corruption remains a concern, and anticorruption laws are enforced unevenly. Authorities have been criticized for doing little to investigate local official wrongdoing in several high-profile cases.

Antigua's Citizenship by Investment (CBI) Program and Permanent Residence Certificate, in which individuals can be granted citizenship or residency in exchange for a sizable business investment or contribution, have been scrutinized in recent years. In March 2022, US legislators introduced the No Travel for Traffickers Act, making countries that operate CBI programs ineligible for the US visa waiver program. Also in March, Antigua suspended CBI applications from Russian and Belarusian nationals in response to the full-scale Russian military invasion of Ukraine. The European Parliament recommended in March that visa-free access into the European Union (EU) for countries operating CBIs should be restricted.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government of Antigua and Barbuda has gradually improved its accountability structures, but there are deficiencies in how the Public Accounts Committee and the auditor general operate. Public officials must disclose all income, assets and personal gifts received in their official capacity in a confidential report to the Integrity Commission. Resource deficiencies have impeded the commission's ability to investigate corrupt individuals. Despite the Procurement and Contract Management Act of 2011, concerns remain about public procurement—notably regarding the expertise of procurement officials, the completeness of documentation, and that some applications are made retroactively, often with a waiver being requested.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 52 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Press freedom is generally respected in Antigua and Barbuda. Criminal defamation was abolished in 2015. However, under the Sedition and Undesirable Publications Act, seditious libel is a criminal offence punishable by a maximum of two years in prison and a maximum fine of $5,000. Journalists remain at risk of libel suits from politicians subject to media scrutiny. The prime minister has characterized the often-critical Observer as "fake news" and a threat to the country.

Most media outlets are concentrated among a small number of firms affiliated with either the ABLP or UPP.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of worship as well as the right to practice and change religion, and these freedoms are generally respected. A law outlawing blasphemous language is not enforced.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are generally free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed under the constitution, and the government generally respects these rights in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

The country's few nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are active, though inadequately funded and often influenced by the government. The NGO Women Against Rape was one of the plaintiffs in the successful 2022 case challenging the criminalization of same-sex relations.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Labor unions can organize freely and bargain collectively. Workers providing essential services must give notice two weeks before intent to strike. However, the International Labour Organization (ILO) has described the list of essential services as excessively broad. Strikes are rare.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, which is generally respected by the government. In 2018, voters rejected in a referendum the adoption of the Caribbean Court of Justice as their highest appellate court. Thus, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, based in London, retains that role.

In recent years, the courts have increasingly asserted independence from the ABLP government, with the support of the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are mostly upheld. However, prisoners on remand often remain in jail for an average of three to four years before their cases are heard.

Residents of Antigua and Barbuda do not face any significant security threats. However, in 2021 the number of homicides increased dramatically, with 16 homicides compared to 9 in 2020. Ten homicides were recorded in 2022. Gun-related crimes have also increased in recent years.

Prisons are severely overcrowded, and conditions within them are poor. The occupancy rate as of September 2022 was 155 percent.

The 2005 Equal Opportunity Act bars discrimination based on race, gender, class, political affinity, or place of origin. There are no specific laws prohibiting discrimination against people with disabilities. Mental health services require improvement and people with physical disabilities are stigmatized and underemployed. Societal norms discourage participation of women in some sectors of the economy, and few women hold leadership positions in businesses.

In July 2022, the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court ruled that elements of the country's Sexual Offences Act were unconstitutional, effectively decriminalizing same-sex sexual relations. The court found that certain sections went against a person's "right to liberty, protection of the law, freedom of expression, protection of personal property, and protection from discrimination on the basis of sex." The court also held that a constitutional provision prohibiting sex discrimination also prohibits discrimination based on "gender identity, sexual character, and sexual orientation." The court further ruled that "persons" must replace "a male person and a female person" in sections of the act defining intercourse.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education.

Many Barbudans forced to evacuate the island due to Hurricane Irma in 2017 opposed moves by lawmakers in Antigua to eliminate the communal land ownership system that governed the island for almost two centuries, and instead establish private land ownership.

The development of a multimillion-dollar private resort on Barbuda has driven tensions between the Browne government and Barbudan population and their representatives, who are concerned about the environmental impacts of the development. The Browne government has threatened those who attempt to obstruct the plans with jail time. In June, Antigua and Barbuda's final appellate court, the UK-based Privy Council, rejected a challenge to the Paradise Found Act 2015, which the appellants argued violated their constitutional right of "protection from deprivation of property" and infringed on communal land rights in Barbuda.

The Domestic Violence Act of 2015 strengthened punishments for perpetrators of domestic violence and laid out a process for victims to obtain an order of protection. However, domestic violence remains a serious problem.

In October, Antigua's House of Representatives passed the Sexual Offenders Registry Bill, enacting increased monitoring of sex offenders and facilitating the sharing of information among jurisdictions. Debate on the bill involved balancing concerns between protecting victims and allowing for the rehabilitation of remorseful offenders.

Same-sex marriage and civil partnerships are not recognized.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Antigua and Barbuda is a destination and transit country for the trafficking of men, women, and children for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Government efforts to address the problem are inadequate, but progress is being made, according to the US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons report.

Compulsory labor is prohibited by law.

In May 2022, the government ratified the ILO's Violence and Harassment Convention. The document recognizes the right to go to work without experiencing violence and harassment with an emphasis on abuses experienced by women in the workplace, a well as the effects of domestic violence on women's ability to work.

Argentina

Population: 46,200,000
Capital: Buenos Aires
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Argentina is a vibrant representative democracy with competitive elections, lively media and civil society sectors, and unfettered public debate. Economic instability, institutional weakness, corruption and drug-related violence are among the country's most serious challenges.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Vice President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner survived an assassination attempt outside her home in September. Several people accused of being involved in the attack were arrested that month, and investigations into alleged links between right-wing extremist groups and the attempt on Fernández de Kirchner's life were ongoing through year's end.
- In December, a court found Fernández de Kirchner guilty on corruption charges related to public works contracts issued during her 2007–15 presidential term. She was sentenced to six years in prison and permanently banned from holding public office, but the sentence will not take effect until the appeals process is complete.
- Also in December, the Supreme Court reversed a 2020 decree that had decreased federal funding for the city of Buenos Aires—which is governed by the opposition—and ordered the government to restore funding to the capital city. President Alberto Fernández initially said he would not comply, but later accepted the ruling, though he continued to accuse the court of political bias.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for a president to be elected for a four-year term, with the option of reelection for one additional term. Presidential candidates must win 45 percent of the vote to avoid a runoff.

Center-left candidate Alberto Fernández of the Front for Everyone (FdT) coalition was elected in the first round of elections in October 2019 with 48.2 percent of the vote, defeating incumbent Mauricio Macri of the Together for Change (JxC) bloc, who obtained 40.3 percent. International observers deemed the poll competitive and credible.

Fernández's victory was widely viewed as benefiting from having political veteran and former president Cristina Fernández de Kirchner on his ticket. A member of the populist Peronist movement, she was the subject of multiple allegations of corruption at the time of the election.

The National Congress consists of a lower house, the Chamber of Deputies, and an upper house, the Senate. The Chamber of Deputies has 257 members elected for four-year terms, and the Senate has 72 members elected for six-year terms. Half of all deputies and a third of senators are up for election every two years through a proportional-representation system with closed party lists. Legislative contests are generally deemed free and fair.

The FdT did poorly against JxC in the November 2021 legislative elections, marking an end to a decades-long majority for Peronist-led coalitions, although the governing coalition maintained a narrow plurality in both houses. The FdT notably lost ground in Buenos Aires Province, while the left-wing Workers' Left Front and the far-right Freedom Advances did well nationally.

Argentina has a clear and relatively fair framework for conducting elections. There is universal suffrage: voting is compulsory for people between 18 and 70 years old, and voluntary for people between 16 and 18 or older than 70.

However, the system suffers from shortcomings, including the inconsistent enforcement of electoral laws and campaign finance regulations. Additionally, each party must print and distribute its own paper ballots on election day, providing opportunities for abuse and favoring larger parties.

Aspects of election management fall under the purview of the executive branch; the National Electoral Chamber (CNE) works in conjunction with the National Electoral Directorate (DNE), a department of the Interior Ministry.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

Argentina has competitive political parties that operate without undue obstacles. Primary elections are mandatory for presidential and legislative elections, and only party candidates that obtain 1.5 percent of the national vote in primary elections can contest general elections.

Argentina's multiparty system affords opposition candidates the realistic opportunity to compete for political power. Opposition parties command significant popular support, have a large presence in Congress, and govern several provinces.

The 2019 presidential election marked a return of Peronism; former president Macri was the only non-Peronist to complete a presidential term since 1928.

Argentinians' political choices are generally free from domination by democratically unaccountable groups. However, political choices are influenced by voter intimidation and clientelism, particularly in poorer regions.

A failed assassination attempt against Vice President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner in September 2022 drew widespread condemnation across the political spectrum. Some of the vice president's supporters, however, blamed the opposition for the attack, claiming that opposition politicians have encouraged political violence. Several people, including the gunman, were arrested in connection with the attempt on the vice president's life; investigations into alleged links between right-wing extremist groups and the attack on Fernández de Kirchner were ongoing at year's end. At least three people accused of participating in the attack remained in pretrial detention at the end of the year.

All segments of the population have full political rights. However, in practice, poorer Argentinians, ethnic minorities, and Indigenous people have limited access to political power.

The government has taken steps to improve women's presence in politics. All legislative party lists must respect full gender parity by law. After the November 2021 elections, women held 44.8 percent of lower-house seats and 43.1 of upper-house seats. A Ministry of Women, Genders, and Diversity (MMGD), which promotes equality and combats gender-based violence, was formed in 2019. However, men still dominate judicial and political positions at the national and provincial levels. Only 2 of Argentina's 24 provinces have women governors, and the Supreme Court has no female members.

LGBT+ people are well-represented in Argentina and legal protections for LGBT+ people are robust. In 2021, Congress passed a law mandating that 1 percent of public sector jobs be reserved for transgender people.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials are duly installed without interference. The political system is characterized by a powerful executive, with the president having authority to implement some policies by decree, bypassing the legislative branch. Provincial governors are also powerful and tend to influence national lawmakers representing their provinces.

Vice President Fernández de Kirchner handpicked Alberto Fernández (no relation) as presidential candidate and has been the driving force behind the ruling coalition. Several ministers and lawmakers answer personally to her. Growing divisions between them have weakened the president's authority.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

A weak institutional framework hampers anticorruption efforts. The country's main anticorruption body is part of the executive, legislative oversight is scarce, and the judiciary is widely considered to be politicized and ineffectual, especially at the provincial level.

Many politicians hold immunity in connection with their elected posts, and are thus protected from legal consequences for corrupt behavior.

In recent years, incumbent vice president Cristina Fernández de Kirchner has been the subject of numerous investigations for alleged corruption during her 2007–15 presidential term. In December 2022, Fernández de Kirchner was found guilty of fraud for improperly awarding approximately $1 billion in public contracts to a family friend while serving as president. Fernández de Kirchner—Argentina's first vice president to be convicted of a crime while in office—has condemned the conviction as politically motivated. She was sentenced to six years in prison and permanently banned from holding public office, but the sentence will not be imposed until the appeals process is complete.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

An agency to guarantee access to public information was created by law in 2017 but is not independent of the presidency. Adherence to and enforcement of public-asset disclosure regulations is inconsistent. Though the Constitution requires the head of the cabinet to appear before Congress monthly to report on the government's progress and answer questions, this rarely happens in practice.

The national government has endeavored to digitize records and procedural documents, but local and provincial governments have been slower in this work.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 50 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Argentina has a robust and lively media environment. The law guarantees freedom of expression and bans official censorship. However, media ownership is concentrated among large conglomerates that frequently favor a political grouping, and state advertising allocation tends to favor government-friendly media groups. Journalists face occasional harassment and violence, especially when covering corruption and drug-related criminality. Some journalists have faced charges in connection with their investigative work.

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed and enforced in practice. The population is largely Roman Catholic but public education is secular, and religious minorities express their faiths freely.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is guaranteed by law and largely observed in practice.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is vibrant and largely unrestricted. However, government agencies have been known to monitor social media activity, and intelligence services have been accused of illegally surveilling journalists, politicians, and civil society groups. In November 2022, a federal prosecutor requested that former president Macri be indicted on espionage charges for allegedly using Argentina's intelligence services to illegally monitor opposition leaders.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected, and citizens frequently organize protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) generally operate without restrictions. Civic organizations, especially those focused on human rights and abuses committed under the 1976–83 dictatorship, play a major role in society, although some fall victim to corruption.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Union influence remains significant, although it has decreased in recent years. Organized labor is dominated by Peronists, and most labor unions have been controlled by the same individuals or groups for decades. Internal opposition to union leadership has been limited by fraud and intimidation.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The Supreme Court is relatively independent and has resisted executive overreach. However, lower and province-level courts have close ties with political actors and engage in corrupt practices.

Leaders of the ruling coalition frequently attack judicial rulings and accuse the courts of ideological bias. President Fernández continued to accuse the judiciary of political bias in 2022, including in December, after the Supreme Court effectively reversed a 2020 decree that had substantially cut the percentage of federal funds allocated to the opposition-led city of Buenos Aires. The president initially said he would not comply with the ruling, which restored funding to the capital city, but later agreed to accept it.

After taking office, President Fernández and Vice President Fernández de Kirchner proposed legal reforms that, if enacted, could diminish judicial independence. The government has also tried to limit the independence of the body that names and removes judges.

Numerous vacancies and interim appointments hinder the autonomy of the judiciary: one seat on the 5-member Supreme Court has been vacant since late 2021, the role of national ombudsperson has remained vacant for 13 years, and the position of chief prosecutor has been filled on a temporary basis since 2017.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The right to due process is constitutionally protected and generally upheld. However, security officers and some judges are suspected of maintaining criminal ties. Prisons are overcrowded and inmates live in unsuitable conditions. Pretrial detainees represented 54 percent of the country's prison population as of December 2022.

In September, the attorney general's office reported that a total of 1,088 convictions for crimes committed during the 1976–83 dictatorship had been attained since 2006.

Argentina's homicide rate is low compared to other Latin American countries, but violence from criminal groups and the security forces remains a serious issue. International criminal organizations use Argentina as an operational base and a transit route; the country's northern and central regions are particularly affected. Drug-related violence has increased in recent years, especially in the port city of Rosario.

Police misconduct, torture, and brutality against detainees is endemic. Arbitrary arrests and abuses by police are rarely punished in the courts, and police officers commonly collude with drug traffickers.

In recent years, there have been violent clashes between security forces and Indigenous Mapuche activists in Argentina's Patagonia region, as well as repeated confrontations between local residents and activists. Some activists have used violence to seize and occupy land.

Argentina has robust antidiscrimination laws, but enforcement is uneven. Indigenous peoples, approximately 2.4 percent of the population, face government neglect, disproportionate levels of poverty, and poor access to services. Displays of xenophobia against migrants and race-based discrimination are common. Women enjoy legal equality, but continue to face economic discrimination and gender-based wage gaps.

Argentina's LGBT+ population enjoys full legal rights, including marriage, adoption, and the right to serve in the military. However, LGBT+ people do face some degree of societal discrimination, and occasionally, serious violence.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16 (+1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4 (+1)

The government generally respects citizens' constitutional right to travel both inside and outside of Argentina. People are free to change their place of education or employment.

Argentina implemented one of the world's strictest and most prolonged COVID-19 lockdowns. Bans and restrictions on domestic and international travel were sometimes arbitrary and gave way to abuses; security officers used disproportionate force to enforce measures. Almost all COVID-19-related restrictions were lifted in September 2021, including border controls. The government continued to ease remaining travel restrictions during 2022.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because Argentinian authorities lifted COVID-19-related movement restrictions and have subsequently refrained from arbitrary and abusive treatment of travelers.

Citizens generally enjoy the right to own property and establish private businesses. Economic instability, cumbersome regulations, and corruption affect the private sector at all levels.

Approximately 70 percent of the country's rural Indigenous communities lack titles to their lands, and forced evictions, while technically illegal, still occur. Indigenous communities continue to struggle to defend their land rights and reclaim traditional lands.

Argentinians enjoy broad freedom regarding marriage and divorce. Same-sex marriage and adoption by same-sex couples were legalized in 2010. A 2012 gender-identity law allows people to legally change their gender.

Gender-based violence remains a serious problem. The ombudsperson's office reported 242 femicides in 2022.

Abortion was legalized up to the 14th week of pregnancy in 2020, a landmark decision in Latin America.

Argentina faces high poverty rates aggravated by high inflation. In the first half of 2022, the poverty rate was 36.5 percent, with 8.8 percent of people living in extreme poverty.

Forced labor is high in sectors such as garment and brick production, agriculture, and domestic work. At least half of the workforce is informally employed and lacks labor rights and legal protections. Sex trafficking is a serious concern, and efforts to combat it have been hindered by corruption and the complicity of some officials, according to the US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Armenia

Population: 3,000,000
Capital: Yerevan
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Nagorno-Karabakh, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology.

Overview: Armenia is in the midst of a significant transition following mass antigovernment protests and elections in 2018 that forced out an entrenched political elite. The new government has pledged to deal with long-standing problems including systemic corruption, opaque policymaking, a flawed electoral system, and weak rule of law. The country continues to be seriously affected by the 2020 conflict with Azerbaijan, which saw several months of fighting over control of the territory of Nagorno-Karabakh.

- In May, a report by Google's Threat Analysis Group (TAG) linked the Armenian government to the use of Predator spyware, created by the North Macedonian company Cytrox. The spyware had been used to target journalists, dissidents, and human rights activists in several countries, including Armenia. Local media outlets reported that the devices of several political dissidents had been hacked.
- In September, Azerbaijani military forces entered Armenian territory. The escalation of the ongoing military conflict killed nearly 200 and injured more than 293 Armenian soldiers; three civilians were killed; and 20 soldiers were taken as prisoners of war. Official reports included credible evidence that Azerbaijani troops had committed war crimes. While active hostilities lasted two days, the subsequent ceasefire has been regularly violated.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 23 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

Constitutional changes in 2015 transformed the country from a semipresidential to a parliamentary republic. The president is chosen by the parliament for a single seven-year term, and most executive power lies with the prime minister, who is chosen by a parliamentary majority. In January 2022, President Armen Sargsyan, who had been elected before the 2018 revolution, resigned. Vahagn Khachaturyan, who was serving as minister of high-tech industry, was elected as president.

In June 2021, Nikol Pashinyan's Civil Contract Party won a majority of seats in snap elections called after Pashinyan resigned as prime minister in April. The party's electoral victory allowed him to retain his position as prime minister. Though Pashinyan's win was contested by the opposition, the Constitutional Court upheld the election results, and local and international observers considered the elections to be free and fair, despite some irregularities.

The National Assembly consists of a minimum of 101 members elected for five-year terms under a newly adopted closed-list proportional representation system, simplifying the previous two-tier proportional representation system. Up to four additional seats are reserved for ethnic minority representatives, and further seats can be added to ensure that opposition parties hold at least 30 percent of the seats.

In April 2021, Pashinyan resigned as prime minister, triggering snap parliamentary elections that June. Three parties gained seats in the June parliamentary elections, with Pashinyan's Civil Contract Party winning a stable majority of 71 seats with 53.9 percent of the vote. The new Armenia Alliance, led by former president Robert Kocharyan, gained 29 seats with 21.1 percent of the vote. Another new bloc, the I Have Honor Alliance, founded by former president Serzh Sargsyan (unrelated to Armen Sargsyan), gained 7 seats after receiving 5.2 percent of the vote, though one representative left I Have Honor to become an independent lawmaker in December. Though party alliances are required to meet a 7 percent electoral threshold, the threshold was waived for Sargsyan's alliance, as Armenian law mandates that legislature must be composed of no fewer than three parties.

Local and international observers deemed the elections to be competitive, well-organized, and fairly administered, though there were some irregularities.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Members of the Central Election Commission (CEC) are recommended and then confirmed by the parliament for six-year terms. According to international observers, during the June 2021 elections, the CEC conducted its work in a transparent and efficient manner, meeting all legal deadlines and enjoying a high level of confidence in its capacity to deliver its mandate. In October 2022, Vahagn Hovakimyan, a member of the ruling party, was elected head of CEC, drawing concerns from civil society groups about the independence and neutrality of the CEC.

In April 2021, the parliament amended existing electoral laws to reflect recommendations made by the Venice Commission and the Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR) within the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE). The June snap elections were successfully administered under the reformed system, which eliminated territorial lists, simplifying the existing electoral system. The amendments enjoyed broad support by political forces and civil society; further reforms were also adopted in May 2021.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

Political parties and opposition groups have been able to operate in a much freer environment since 2018. In January 2021, amendments to the Law on Parties took effect, tying public funding of political parties to female and nationwide representation and capping individual donations.

An unprecedented number of political entities—22 political parties and 4 alliances—took part in June 2021 snap parliamentary elections.

Before 2018, elections were highly flawed; the Republican Party of Armenia (HHK) had been the main ruling party since 1997, and opposition groups had little chance of winning power. However, the 2018 polls transformed the political landscape, and elections have become significantly more competitive. International and local observers deemed the June 2021 snap elections, which saw two opposition alliances gain parliamentary seats, to be competitive.

Following local elections in December 2021, authorities within the Ministry of Justice began prosecuting several opposition-affiliated elected representatives of local government bodies, including various cities' Councils of Elders. Local human rights advocates claimed the cases against the elected officials were politically motivated and called on the government to enable them to carry out their duties. In September 2022 local elections, the opposition parties won control of 9 out of 18 communities.

In July 2022, the vice speaker of Parliament and the chairman of a standing committee—both from the opposition—were forced out of their positions due to absences. In protest, other opposition members resigned from their leadership posts in standing committees. The open posts remained vacant at the end of the year.

In April 2021, the parliament adopted amendments calling for heavier penalties for vote buying, election-related violence, and disrupting the electoral process. They also criminalized the obstruction of pre-election campaign activities.

Though the 2021 elections saw a decline in such practices, international observers reported allegations of election disruption, including isolated incidents of vote buying and the misuse of administrative resources.

A system introduced as part of 2015 constitutional reforms mandates the inclusion of up to four members of Parliament representing ethnic minorities; all four must be elected on a party list. In 2021, the Civil Contract Party won three minority seats representing ethnic Russians, Yazidis, and Kurds, while the Armenia Alliance won one seat representing ethnic Assyrians.

No openly LGBT+ people have run in elections or been appointed to a public office in Armenia. Women remain underrepresented in politics and government, and most parties do little to address women's interests aside from meeting the gender quota on candidate lists.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

Through its significant majority, gained in a free and fair election, the Civil Contract Party controlled parliamentary decision-making after the June 2021 snap elections. Though Prime Minister Pashinyan promised to loosen the influence of business over policymaking, two wealthy businessmen entered the parliament from his party list. Some opposition parliamentarians also maintain close ties to businesspeople.

Since facilitating the November 2020 cease-fire agreement that paused the conflict over Nagorno-Karabakh, Russia wields increased influence in Armenia as the main mediator in Armenian-Azerbaijani negotiations and has deployed military forces across the Armenian-Azerbaijani borders.

In May, opposition groups in the parliament boycotted parliamentary sessions and demanded the prime minister's resignation due to Pashinyan's handling of the conflict with Azerbaijan. However, the opposition groups failed to gain public support and dismantled their tents after two months of blockading the center of Yerevan. They continued boycotting parliamentary sessions until mid-November.

Relationships between politicians, public servants, and businesspeople have historically influenced policy and contributed to selective application of the law. High-level government officials are rarely investigated despite clear evidence of improper uses of their office. Though the government attempted to investigate past wrongdoings and fortify anticorruption mechanisms after the revolution, those measures were significantly hindered by security challenges following the 2020 war.

In November 2022, the new Anti-Corruption Court and the Anti-Corruption Chamber of the Court of Cassation went into effect after legislation created the two bodies in April 2021. Though authorities have initiated high-profile corruption investigations, no charges have been brought forward. In August 2022, prosecutors initiated lawsuits to recover stolen assets from allegedly corrupt former officials from the prerevolution regime. In November, Mnatsakan Martirosyan's election as an Anti-Corruption Court judge sparked controversy, as several of his rulings in politically charged cases had been overturned by the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR).

Transparency has historically been limited, and enforcement of asset-declaration rules for public officials has been weak. In 2020, the parliament made strides in enhancing transparency, including by strengthening asset-declaration requirements, though a lack of transparency and accountability persists.

Prime Minister Pashinyan no longer conducts in-person press conferences with journalists, instead conducting them online, which has been criticized by local media groups.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 31 / 60 (−1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Independent and investigative outlets operate relatively freely in Armenia, and generally publish online. Small independent outlets often provide robust coverage challenging the narratives of state broadcasters and other establishment media. By comparison, most print and broadcast outlets are affiliated with political or larger commercial interests.

In 2021, authorities imposed several new restrictions on media freedom, including limiting the free movement of journalists in the parliament and in parts of the Syunik region. In July of that year, the parliament criminalized the act of directing serious insults (defamation) toward officials and public figures. After significant outcry from journalists' associations and human rights organizations raising concerns that the law could be easily abused, the law was removed from the criminal code in July 2022.

The Committee to Protect Freedom of Expression (CPFE), a local nongovernmental organization (NGO), recorded that 15 journalists had experienced physical violence between January and September 2022.

Article 18 of the constitution recognizes the Armenian Apostolic Church as a "national church" responsible for the preservation of Armenian national identity; 94 percent of the population identifies as Armenian Apostolic. Religious minorities have reported some discrimination in the past.

In 2020, the National Security Service (NSS) opened an investigation into Yazidi activist Sashik Sultanyan after he publicly stated that Yazidis experience discrimination in Armenia; international human rights nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have criticized the investigation as retaliatory and unlawful. The trial was in progress at the end of 2022.

Although the constitution protects academic freedom, administrative and accreditation processes remain open to political influence. There is some self-censorship among academics on politically sensitive subjects.

In March 2021, the parliament issued an executive order allowing the government to appoint most members of the boards of trustees for three of the country's leading state universities, which enables the authorities to exercise more control over the universities' key decisions, including the election of university rectors.

In August 2022, Yerevan State University student Taron Manukyan, son of opposition member of Parliament Gegham Manukyan who had been arrested for assault, was expelled from the university for failing to take in-person exams. Gegham Manukyan claimed authorities had stepped in to prevent his son from sitting for his online or at the place he is detained, as other people in prison had been able to do so.

Private discussion is relatively free and vibrant. The law prohibits wiretapping or other electronic surveillance without judicial approval, though the judiciary lacks independence and has been accused of excessive deference to law enforcement agencies requesting consent.

In July 2022, the minister of justice removed provisions from the criminal code that criminalized defamation, which had been implemented in July 2021 and had been used to open at least nine criminal cases against people accused of insulting public figures.

In late 2021, reports by Meta and Citizen Lab claimed that Armenian authorities had paid for the use of Predator spyware, created by the North Macedonian company Cytrox. The spyware had been used to target journalists, dissidents, and human rights activists in several countries, including Armenia. In May 2022, a report by Google's Threat Analysis Group (TAG) also linked the use of Cytrox spyware to victims in Armenia, claiming "government-backed actors" were responsible. Local media outlets reported that the devices of several political dissidents had been hacked.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The right to assemble is legally guaranteed but inconsistently upheld in practice.

Frequent antigovernment protests took place throughout the country in 2022. In June, police used stun grenades to disperse protesters in Yerevan who were demanding Prime Minister Pashinyan's resignation after a law proposed by opposition that would reject any peace accord with Azerbaijan failed to pass in Parliament. At least 42 people, including police officers, were injured in the clashes between police and protesters.

In September 2022, relatives of soldiers who had been killed in the war with Azerbaijan peacefully protested during government-organized Independence Day events. Police violently detained at least 37 people, and some protesters were injured. In response, 35 local NGOs called for the resignation of the Yerevan chief of police.

Outspoken NGOs operate in Armenia, most of which are based in Yerevan. These NGOs lack significant local funding and often rely on foreign donors. Despite this impediment, civil society was active in the 2018 protests, and has consulted with the government on policy matters, most notably on electoral, constitutional, and anticorruption reform.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The law protects the rights of workers to form and join independent unions, strike, and engage in collective bargaining. However, these protections are not well enforced, and employers are generally able to block union activity in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16 (−1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The courts face systemic political influence, and judicial institutions are undermined by corruption. Judges reportedly feel pressure to work with prosecutors to convict defendants, and acquittal rates are extremely low. The government published a five-year judicial-reform strategy in 2019; reforms continued to be enacted in 2022, though progress has been slow.

In July 2022, the acting head of Supreme Judicial Council (SJC) resigned after a recording leaked in which he threatened then-head of the SJC with criminal charges if the latter refused to resign. In October, to new SJC members were elected by the ruling faction, including a former minister of justice who had also been a member of the ruling party. The election was viewed as politically motivated.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Authorities apply the law selectively, and due process is not guaranteed in civil or criminal cases. Lengthy pretrial detention remains a problem, and the Armenian judiciary is largely distrusted by the public.

The raft of corruption investigations aimed at HHK elites and allies have prompted concerns about the ability of the country's judicial and investigative mechanisms to ensure fair application of the law.

Reports of police abuse of detainees and poor conditions in prisons persist. After the change in government in 2018, law enforcement agencies renewed dormant investigations into past cases of physical violence by police.

Conditions in areas adjacent to Azerbaijan and Nagorno-Karabakh, an ethnic Armenian-majority territory that previously gained de facto independence from Azerbaijan in 1994, have declined following the 2020 military conflict in the region. Civilians in the region remain at risk of experiencing physical violence.

In September 2022, Azerbaijani military forces entered Armenian territory. The escalation of the ongoing military conflict killed over 200 and injured more than 293 Armenian soldiers. Three civilians were killed, and 20 soldiers were taken as prisoners of war. Official reports included credible evidence that Azerbaijani troops had committed war crimes. Civilian settlements and buildings Syunik, Gegharkunik and Vayots Dzor provinces were also targeted, causing significant damage and displacing thousands of civilians. While active hostilities lasted two days, the subsequent ceasefire has been regularly violated.

Dozens of Armenian prisoners of war reportedly remained in Azerbaijani custody in 2022. Some were reportedly tortured while in detention.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to an escalation in military aggression from Azerbaijan, with Azerbaijani forces launching several attacks on Armenian territory that killed more than 200 people and caused mass displacement of civilians.

Women reportedly face discrimination in employment and education, despite legal protections.

Although same-sex sexual activity was decriminalized in 2003, LGBT+ people continue to face violence and mistreatment at the hands of police and civilians. In 2022, several cases of attacks on trans women and public calls for violence against LGBT+ people were reported.

Under the new criminal code implemented in 2022, individuals who commit crimes based on sexual orientation and gender identity may be held criminally liable.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The law protects freedom of movement and the rights of individuals to change their place of residence, employment, and education. In practice, access to higher education is somewhat hampered by a culture of bribery.

Effects of the conflict over Nagorno-Karabakh have continued into 2022, continuing to constrain freedom of movement along some border areas. After the November 2020 ceasefire, Azerbaijani forces took control over a 21-kilometer (13-mile) stretch of the Goris-Kapan highway, the only major road connecting the Syunik region to the rest of Armenia, partitioning villages and affecting residents' ability to move freely. In November 2021, Azerbaijani forces built new checkpoints along the road.

Azerbaijani forces continued to occupy Armenian territory in 2022 and have frequently acted to impede the internal movement of Armenian residents, using threat of force against civilians to exert control. In September, Azerbaijani forces launched another military offensive, killing hundreds of soldiers and three civilians, and destroying infrastructure in the Syunik region.

Armenian law adequately protects property rights, though officials have not always upheld them in the past. Economic diversification and simpler regulations have increased the ease of doing business in recent years, but a lack of transparency and persistent cronyism created unfair advantages for those with ties to public officials during the HHK government's tenure. However, much of this has subsided since the 2018 change in government.

Numerous incidents of burning pastures and farms, as well as theft of cattle, were reported after the escalation of the militarized conflict and the entry of Azerbaijani troops into Armenia in September 2022.

The constitution defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman. Domestic violence is common and not adequately prosecuted, and services for victims are inadequate. A new law on domestic violence that took effect in 2018 placed an emphasis on "restoring family harmony," raising concerns that it would deter victims from leaving dangerous situations. In 2019, the government introduced amendments to remove that reference and expand the definition of what constituted domestic violence. In early January 2020, a women's rights activist reported that police became more responsive to domestic violence cases after the law's introduction.

The HHK government signed the Istanbul Convention, a Council of Europe (CoE) document that binds participating countries to bolster their efforts to combat violence against women, in 2018. While the government has not yet ratified the Istanbul Convention, the parliament did approve the ratification of the Lanzarote Convention, a CoE document that requires signatories to address sexual violence against children, in May 2020. The July 2022 criminal code includes more significant protections for survivors of gender-based violence (GBV).

Legal protections against exploitative or dangerous working conditions are poorly enforced, and about half of workers are employed in the informal sector, where they may be more exposed to such conditions. Armenians are subjected to sex and labor trafficking abroad, and some children in the country work in agriculture and other sectors. Children residing in care institutions face a particularly heightened risk of trafficking. According to the US State Department, the government does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so.

Australia

Population: 25,800,000
Capital: Canberra
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Australia has a strong record of advancing and protecting political rights and civil liberties. Challenges to these freedoms include the threat of foreign political influence, harsh policies toward asylum seekers, discrimination against LGBT+ people, increasingly stringent checks against the press, and ongoing difficulties ensuring the equal rights of First Nations Australians.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In May, Anthony Albanese of the Labor Party was sworn in as prime minister following parliamentary elections that handed a major defeat to the ruling coalition led by Prime Minister Scott Morrison of the Liberal Party.
- In August, it emerged that when he was prime minister, Morrison had secretly appointed himself to jointly lead five ministries between March 2020 and May 2021.
- In March, Western Australia reopened its interstate and international borders, becoming the country's final state or territorial government to lift pandemic-related travel restrictions.

POLITICAL RIGHTS 38 / 40 (−1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Australian government is a parliamentary democracy under a constitutional monarchy. The leader of the popularly elected majority party or coalition is designated as prime minister, and serves as head of government. Anthony Albanese, leader of the Labor Party, became prime minister after free and fair federal elections in May 2022. His predecessor, Scott Morrison of the Liberal Party, was the first prime minister to serve an uninterrupted three-year term since 2007. The 2010s saw the premiership frequently switch hands following "leadership coups" in which politicians within the major parties contested the party leadership and, in turn, the office of prime minister. This pattern drew criticism for failing to reflect the will of the electorate, and both Labor and the Liberals have reformed their internal rules to make leadership challenges more difficult.

A governor-general, appointed on the recommendation of the prime minister, represents the monarch of the United Kingdom (UK) as head of state. The powers of the monarchy are extremely limited. David Hurley was appointed governor-general in 2019.

The September 2022 death of Queen Elizabeth II triggered debate about whether Australia should become a republic. Republican sentiment is divided in Australia, with polls in late 2022 showing between 40 and 46 percent of respondents supporting calls for an Australian head of state. Following the Australian Labor Party's victory in the 2022 election, the Albanese government created a new post, assistant minister for the republic, fueling speculation that it might push for a referendum on the issue.

The bicameral legislative branch consists of a 151-member House of Representatives and 76-member Senate. Lower house members are elected through a ranked-choice ballot, and serve three-year terms. Senators are elected through a ranked-choice ballot and serve staggered six-year terms.

The 2022 federal election saw the Labor Party returned to power after almost a decade in opposition after winning 77 seats in the House of Representatives, enough to form a single-party majority. The previous ruling coalition, composed of longtime partners the Liberal Party and the National Party, won less than 40 percent of seats in the lower house, losing 19 seats in the worst electoral defeat for Australian conservative parties in decades. Several senior Liberal Party figures, most notably Deputy Leader Josh Frydenberg, lost seats traditionally held safely by the party. Scott Morrison kept his seat, but was replaced as party leader soon after the election by Peter Dutton.

However, the coalition's resounding defeat did not translate to a landslide victory for the Labor Party, with Independent candidates and the Greens gaining ground. Six lower house seats were claimed by so-called "teal Independents," named for the color many of them used for their campaign signs, a loose association of mostly female Independent candidates. Many had no background in politics, but campaigned on transparency and climate and environmental issues. Teal candidates notably won some usually safe Liberal seats. Independent candidates who were not associated with the teal movement won four seats.

The Greens, a left-wing party traditionally aligned with Labor, won four seats in the lower house, an increase of three from the 2019 elections, while two minor parties, Centre Alliance and Katter's Australian Party, won one seat each.

Forty seats in the Senate were filled in the same contest. Labor and the Liberal-National coalition each won 15 seats; the Greens won 6; and the remaining seats were divided between Independents and minor parties, with one going to the far-right One Nation Party. Turnout for the election stood at 89.8 percent.

On Election Day, the Liberal Party drew criticism for sending an SMS message to millions of voters detailing the interception of a boat carrying asylum seekers travelling to Australia. The SMS message urged voters to "keep our borders secure by voting Liberal today." Asylum seekers, particularly those arriving unlawfully by boat, are a hot-button issue in Australian politics and the text message was widely viewed as a scare campaign. Correspondence released under freedom of information laws after the election revealed that the Morrison Government had pressured immigration officials to prepare and release a statement about the interception while events were still unfolding, and that officials described the request as "astonishing in form and timing." and "unprecedented."

Australian electoral laws and procedures are generally fair and impartial. The Australian Electoral Commission (AEC)—an independent federal agency—coordinates all federal elections and referendums, draws seat boundaries, and keeps the electoral rolls. Voting is compulsory, and a registered voter's failure to vote may result in a small fine, which if unpaid can increase and ultimately lead to a criminal conviction.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

Australians may organize political parties without restrictions. Registration and recognition as a political party requires a party constitution and either one member in Parliament, or at least 500 members on the electoral roll.

Power rotates between parties frequently, traditionally alternating between the Labor Party and the Liberal-National coalition. The Greens and smaller left-leaning parties tend to ally with Labor, while rural-oriented and conservative parties often ally with the Liberals.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Political participation in Australia is largely free from undue domestic influence. The UK's monarch remains the Australian head of state, but the monarchy's power is strictly limited by the Australian constitution and legal precedent.

On Election Day in 2022, the Morrison government placed pressure on public servants working for Australian Border Force (ABF), part of the country's immigration apparatus, to hastily release information about the interception of a Sri Lankan asylum seeker boat; the pressure and subsequent release of a Liberal Party SMS message about the situation appeared to be an attempt to influence the election.

Concerns about foreign interference in politics, particular from China, have persisted for several years. There have been allegations that Chinese actors, possibly including consular officials, have funded political candidates and parties. The government banned foreign donations to political parties, independent candidates, and other political campaign groups in 2018. Additionally, the Foreign Influence Transparency Scheme, which came into force that year, requires people who engage in political activities, such as lobbying on behalf of a foreign government or other entity, to register publicly.

Political rights and electoral opportunities are granted to all Australians. The interests of women are inadequately represented, but the results of the 2022 election offer cautious optimism that this situation is changing.

Following the election, 58 seats, or 38 percent of total seats, in the lower house were held by women, an increase of 10 from the previous parliament, and women made up a majority of the Australian Senate, holding 57 percent of its seats. A notable feature of the 2022 elections was the role played by female "teal Independent" candidates, who in several cases ousted male incumbents in seats long considered safe.

The Labor Party employs an internal quota specifying that 45 percent of its candidates must be women, a quota that will rise to 50 percent by 2025). A majority—52 of 103—of the members of the Labor Party's federal caucus are women. By contrast, the Liberal Party has long resisted calls to introduce a gender quota system, and Liberal leader Peter Dutton and National Party leader David Littleproud again ruled out introducing quotas in 2022.

Women in parliament have reported being intimidated and harassed by their male colleagues. A November 2021 report by Australia's sex discrimination commissioner, Kate Jenkins, found that a third of federal political staffers experienced sexual harassment at work. That same year, a series of high-profile sexual assault allegations emerged, corroborating the commissioner's report and highlighting the misogyny and physical endangerment women in Australian politics face. One of those cases was the alleged 2019 rape of Liberal Party staffer Brittany Higgins by a colleague in the office of the defense minister at the time, Linda Reynolds, in 2019. Higgins accused the Liberal Party of covering up the story and leaking her personal information to journalists in an attempt to undermine her credibility. Higgins's alleged rapist, Bruce Lehrmann, was charged but, in October 2022, his trial before the Supreme Court of the Australian Capital Territory was aborted due to juror misconduct. A retrial, scheduled for February 2023, was abandoned by the prosecution, citing the impact that retestifying was likely to have on Higgins's mental health. Both Higgins and Lehrmann foreshadowed further legal proceedings in relation to the way the trial was handled and the surrounding media coverage.

The May 2022 elections resulted in improvements in the gender and racial diversity of Australia's Parliament, with successful candidates including Independent representative Dai Le, a journalist and former Vietnamese refugee, and Labor senator Fatima Payman, the daughter of an Afghan Hazara refugee, who became Australia's first hijab-wearing Muslim parliamentarian. However, Parliament remains disproportionately White compared to the make-up of Australia's population. Openly LGBT+ representatives have served in Parliament since the 1990s.

Indigenous Australians are generally underrepresented in Australian politics and some voting restrictions—including the requirement that voters hold a fixed address and a ban on voting by prisoners serving long sentences—disproportionately affect Indigenous populations. However, the 2022 elections brought the total number of sitting Indigenous legislators to 11, bringing the proportion of First Nations parliamentarians—4.8 percent—above the proportion of Indigenous Australians as part of the Australian population—3.3 percent.

After forming its government in 2022, the Labor Party pledged to hold a referendum by mid-2024 about constitutionally enshrining an Indigenous Voice to Parliament, a body that would advise Parliament on policy matters affecting Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples. Text of the proposed constitutional reform was released in July 2022.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT 11 / 12 (−1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected government is generally able to develop and implement policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Laws against official corruption are generally well enforced, but the absence of a federal anticorruption body has made enforcement more difficult. All states and territories operate local anticorruption bodies.

After coming to power in 2022, Labor introduced legislation to create a National Anti-Corruption Commission (NACC), which passed the House of Representatives and the Senate in late November. The NACC will have retrospective powers to investigate a broad range of conduct by public officials. Though the NACC's inclusive definition of corrupt conduct received praise, other elements received criticism from some legislators and transparency experts, notably the fact that the legislation as drafted only allows for public hearings in exceptional circumstances.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4 (−1)

Government operations are characterized by a high degree of transparency, and political affairs are openly discussed in Parliament and in the media. Parliamentary records and commissioned reports are readily available. The Freedom of Information (FOI) Act allows people to access a wide range of government documents, though some government agencies have been criticized for long delays and unnecessary refusals of FOI requests.

In August 2022, it emerged in a series of reports that, while serving as prime minister, Scott Morrison had secretly appointed himself cominister of five portfolios between March 2020 and May 2021. In addition to the premiership, Morrison was jointly serving as minister of health, minister of finance, minister of industry, science, energy and resources (ISER), treasurer, and minister of home affairs—giving him power over 6 of the 14 departments of state. Morrison justified his self-appointments as a contingency plan should the responsible ministers contract COVID-19. Morrison denied ever exercising the powers granted by the secret appointments except in one case where he intervened in an offshore gas exploration matter.

There was significant criticism, from both the media and political class, of Morrison's conduct, including of his justification for the self-appointments and the secrecy surrounding them. Notably, three of Morrison's own cabinet ministers were unaware he had appointed himself to their portfolios; one of those former ministers, Karen Andrews, who had unknowingly jointly administered the home affairs ministry with Morrison, publicly called for him to resign from Parliament over the scandal.

While legal advice given to the Albanaese government by the Australian solicitor general found that Morrison's self-appointments were valid and had not breached any laws, it also found that Morrison's secrecy over the appointments was inconsistent with the constitutional principle of responsible government. The advice noted that, because Morrison's appointment was not publicly known, and because Morrison was legally and politically responsible for the administration of the departments within his ministerial remit, there was no means by which he could be held accountable for any actions he took or did not take. Following the November publication of a scathing report into the self-appointments by former High Court justice Virginia Bell, Morrison became the first former Australian prime minister to be censured by Parliament.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 due to the revelation that former prime minister Scott Morrison had secretly granted himself concurrent responsibility for five separate ministries during his premiership, and that the practice was evidently permissible under existing law.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Though the constitution does not explicitly protect press freedom, journalists scrutinize lawmakers and the government, covering controversial topics generally without serious obstacles or risk of harassment or violence. Members of the press have been constricted by the use of judicial suppression orders while covering criminal cases.

In February 2021, the government passed the News Media and Digital Platforms Mandatory Bargaining Code, which established a mandatory arbitration regime for digital platforms, such as Facebook and Google, to negotiate with and ultimately pay news outlets for using their content. The code has been criticized for potentially weakening media diversity, but by August 2022, it had resulted in an additional AU$200 million ($138 million) in revenue for Australian news outlets arising from deals they struck with global platforms. The increase in revenue has been used to fund new hiring at some outlets.

Public figures, including politicians, regularly sue journalists or members of the public for defamation for publishing unfavorable stories or other content about them, particularly online. In a recent example, the Federal Court of Australia ordered in June 2022 that Google pay former deputy premier of New South Wales John Barilaro AU$715,000 ($493,000) in damages after popular blogger Jordan Shanks-Markovina posted videos on YouTube found to be defamatory toward Barilaro.

The constitution explicitly prohibits laws that would either impose or restrict religious expression, and individuals are generally able to express religious beliefs or nonbelief.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected. However, federal officials have in the past warned of Chinese attempts to monitor Chinese students in Australia, and to question academics in Australia whose views differed from those of the Chinese government. Some students have expressed fears of foreign surveillance, prompting them to wear masks to protect their identities while protesting Chinese government actions. Some universities receive significant amounts of foreign funding, particularly from China, which has further raised concerns over Beijing's influence on curriculums and university governance.

Generally, people in Australia may freely discuss personal views on sensitive topics, though the government has passed several laws in recent years increasing its surveillance powers. A data retention law requires telecommunications companies to store users' metadata for two years and has raised concerns about the government's ability to track mobile and online communications. In 2019, the Australian Federal Police (AFP) disclosed that it accessed Australians' metadata nearly 20,000 times and reviewed the metadata of journalists 58 times during its 2017–18 reporting period.

In late 2021, the Surveillance Legislation Amendment (Identify and Disrupt) Act 2021 was enacted, granting the AFP and the Australian Criminal Intelligence Commission broad surveillance powers, including powers to take over user accounts and disrupt user activity. Rights groups have criticized the laws as overly broad with insufficient safeguards.

The 2018 Assistance and Access Act requires technology companies to provide law enforcement agencies access to encrypted communications, on grounds that include preventing terrorism and crime. Civil rights groups criticized the law's broad reach, relative lack of oversight, and steep fines for companies that do not comply. Vault Systems, an Australian provider of cloud services, warned in 2019 that multinational companies were increasingly housing their data in other countries because of the legislation.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is not explicitly codified in law, but the government generally respects the right to peaceful assembly. There are some limited restrictions meant to ensure public safety, and some incidents of police using excessive force against protesters have been reported. Although public health measures imposed to stop the spread of COVID-19 in 2020 and 2021 constrained the right to assembly, these measures were progressively wound back in 2022. A series of violent protests against vaccination mandates and lockdown restrictions occurred in the country's two largest cities, Sydney and Melbourne, in the second half of 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

NGOs are generally free to form, function, and receive funding. Advocacy groups and charities are exempt from restrictions on donations by certain foreign entities, which were introduced in 2018.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers can freely organize and bargain collectively, and trade unions actively engage in political debates and campaigns. However, strikes are only allowed when negotiating new union agreements, and may only pertain to issues under negotiation, although strikes and other forms of industrial action are not uncommon in Australia. Throughout 2022, the metropolitan train network of Sydney, Australia's largest city, was frequently disrupted due to ongoing disputes between the rail union and the New South Wales state government.

While there are no formal restrictions on workers' rights to organize, in practice, policies from successive governments have contributed to plummetting union membership. By the end of 2022, only 12.5 percent of Australian workers were union members, compared to 41 percent in 1992.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The Australian judiciary is generally independent, although a lengthy investigation in 2019 by independent media outlet Crikey revealed that the Liberal-National government consciously worked to install individuals affiliated with the Liberal Party—including former candidates, donors, and party members—to the Administrative Appeals Tribunal (AAT), a body that reviews the merits of administrative decisions by government agencies. Just prior to the 2022 election, the Morrison government extended the terms of a number of Liberal Party–affiliated members of the AAT for periods of up to seven years, even though many of these members had over a year left in their existing terms. The Albanese government announced in December 2022 that the AAT would be abolished and replaced by a new merits review body in 2023.

The judiciary, particularly in the higher-level courts, tends to lack diversity among its members, and many appointed judges come from prominent legal families.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The right to due process is generally respected. Defendants and detainees are presumed innocent until proven guilty and can only be held for 24 hours without being charged for a crime, with exceptions for terrorism cases.

People living in rural areas, and in particular Aboriginal people, face significant barriers to accessing the justice system. Judges, lawyers, and prosecutors must be flown into remote communities, providing little time to prepare cases or be briefed by clients. Courtrooms are often in ad hoc, repurposed buildings, and lengthy case dockets are a prominent issue. Judges traveling these circuits work large caseloads due to understaffing and underfunding, which could impact their health and their court decisions. Significant case backlogs cause individuals to wait years for their cases to be heard, which can place some, like those who have experienced domestic violence, in further danger.

Authorities shifted court proceedings to be held online during the COVID-19 pandemic, which has led to increased availability of court and registry services and resources. The greater flexibility offered by virtual hearings and services has, to a degree, increased access to the justice system in rural areas.

Australia provides protection from the illegitimate use of force, and Australians have means to seek redress for harm. Prison conditions mostly meet international standards. However, conditions at numerous juvenile detention centers are substandard. Some children have instead been detained in adult prisons. In 2019, an Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) investigative program reported on the practice of placing minors in "watch houses," maximum security facilities usually reserved for violent adult offenders.

First Nations Australians continue to lag behind other groups in key social and economic indicators; suffer higher rates of incarceration; and report routine mistreatment by police and prison officials. Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children are placed in detention at a rate 22 times higher than that of non-Aboriginal children. Additionally, people with disabilities make up almost one-third of the prison population, and face harassment and violence in prisons.

Men and women have the same legal rights, and discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity is prohibited. In practice, women and LGBT+ people experience employment discrimination and harassment.

Religious exemptions within the Sex Discrimination Act of 1984 allow for the expulsion of students and dismissal of teachers on the basis of their sexual orientation, although these exemptions are rarely invoked.

Australia's harsh asylum and immigration policies continued to be enforced in 2022. The government announced in October 2021 that it would cease detaining asylum seekers in Papua New Guinea (PNG) by December, transferring the refugees there either to its other offshore detention facility in Nauru—which is characterized by poor living conditions, inadequate safety for women and children, and a lack of sufficient healthcare and education services—or to the Papuan government. As of September 2022, approximately 111 refugees were in detention on Nauru. Asylum seekers can wait years for their applications to be processed; in one severe case, a man seeking asylum from Sri Lanka who fled to Australia in 2009 was still being held in immigration detention through at least the end of 2020. The Albanese government had indicated in its election campaigning that it would grant eligible refugees permanent visa status, and abolish Temporary Protection Visas (TPVs) and Safe Haven Enterprise Visas (SHEVs), which expired after three years and five years, respectively. In December 2022, the Albanese government announced that in early 2023, 19,000 refugees would be transitioned to permanent protection visas, granting them rights to social security and reunion with family members.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16 (+1)

The government respects freedom of movement, and neither state nor nonstate actors interfere with the choice of residence, employment, or institution of higher education.

In response to the coronavirus pandemic in 2020 and 2021, some state and territory governments periodically closed their internal borders. The process to obtain an exemption for traveling between states was difficult and often significantly delayed. Some people who rely on services including employment or health care across state borders were unable to access these services due to the closures. Some states closed their borders with little notice, and some jurisdictions with lower rates of COVID-19 transmission, particularly Queensland and Western Australia, maintained a hardline stance on internal borders throughout 2021, despite low transmission rates of the virus and high vaccination rates.

Queensland reopened its borders to interstate and international travelers in January 2022, and Western Australia followed suit in March, and since then, no state or territory has reimposed pandemic-related border closures in response to the pandemic.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because the last border closures imposed by state or territorial governments in response to the COVID-19 pandemic were lifted, restoring the freedom of internal travel.

With an open and free market economy, businesses and individuals enjoy a high level of economic freedom and strong protections for property rights.

The government generally does not restrict social freedoms. In 2017, Parliament legalized same-sex marriage following a nationwide, nonbinding postal survey in which more than 60 percent of participants favored legalization. Same-sex couples have also won the right to adopt children at the state level, with the Northern Territory becoming the last state or territory to legalize LGBT+ adoption in 2018. Discrimination based on gender identity was prohibited under a 2013 amendment to the Sex Discrimination Act of 1984.

Gender-based violence (GBV) remains a national concern, particularly for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women. In addition, women who kill domestic abusers in self-defense are often jailed, with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women representing the majority of this incarcerated group. In November 2022, the New South Wales state parliament passed a law criminalizing coercive control in intimate partner relationships, with penalties of up to seven years in prison.

Abortion law is decided by state and territory governments. New South Wales was the last state to decriminalize abortion in 2019. In some states there is no access to abortion through public health systems despite its legality, forcing people in those areas to seek assistance from private providers.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Australians generally enjoy robust economic opportunities and freedom from exploitation. However, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people continue to face economic hardship; census data from 2016 revealed that employment rates in remote areas declined since 2006, impeding their upward social mobility.

In 2018, Parliament passed the Modern Slavery Act, requiring large businesses to be more transparent about potential slavery in their supply chains and to make efforts to address the problem. While the law has been largely viewed favorably, some critics have noted that it fails to impose penalties for noncompliance.

Austria

Population: 9,000,000
Capital: Vienna
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Austria has a democratic system of government that guarantees political rights and civil liberties. The country has historically been governed by grand coalitions of the center-left Social Democratic Party of Austria (SPÖ) and the center-right Austrian People's Party (ÖVP). In recent years, the political system has faced pressure from the Freedom Party of Austria (FPÖ), a right-wing, populist party that openly entertains nationalist and xenophobic sentiments.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Corruption investigations into leading ÖVP and FPÖ politicians continued during the year. Former FPÖ leader Heinz-Christian Strache, who was convicted on corruption charges in 2021, was tried on separate bribery charges in June; Strache was acquitted in July.
- In January, the National Council passed a measure making vaccination against COVID-19 compulsory. The vaccine mandate, which took effect in February, led to protests and was temporarily suspended the next month; the government ultimately abolished the mandate in June.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Executive elections in Austria are generally free and fair. The president is elected for a six-year term and has predominantly ceremonial duties. The president does, however, have the right to dissolve parliament and appoints the chancellor, who also needs the support of the legislature to govern. President Alexander Van der Bellen, former Green Party leader, narrowly prevailed in 2016 against FPÖ candidate Norbert Hofer. The 2016 polls featured a runoff that was repeated twice after the Constitutional Court (VfGH) established that there had been problems with the handling of postal ballots. Van der Bellen was reelected to the presidency in October 2022 after securing an absolute majority of the vote.

Following snap elections in 2019, an ÖVP–Green government took office in January 2020, marking the first time the Greens have participated in a national government. Sebastian Kurz of the ÖVP, who led the previous ÖVP–FPÖ coalition, returned as chancellor. Kurz was forced to resign the chancellorship in October 2021 over corruption allegations, and ultimately left politics altogether. After Kurz's resignation, then foreign minister Alexander Schallenberg was appointed chancellor; Schallenberg resigned several weeks later, in December.

In December 2021, ÖVP party officials chose then interior minister Karl Nehammer to become both party leader and chancellor. Nehammer was sworn in as chancellor that month, and was officially confirmed as ÖVP party chair in May 2022.

Legislative elections in Austria are generally considered free and fair. The 183 members of the National Council (Nationalrat), the lower house of the Austrian national parliament, are chosen through proportional representation at the district, state, and federal levels, and serve five-year terms. The 61 members of the upper house, the Federal Council (Bundesrat), are appointed by state legislatures for five- or six-year terms.

Snap National Council elections took place in September 2019, after the Ibizagate affair triggered the previous ÖVP–FPÖ coalition's collapse. The ÖVP was the clear winner with 71 seats, though it did not win a parliamentary majority. The Green Party returned after a two-year absence from parliament, winning 26 seats. Support for the FPÖ collapsed, with the party losing 20 seats and holding 31. The SPÖ won 40, while the Liberal Forum (NEOS) claimed 15.

Austria's electoral laws are fair and implemented impartially by the relevant bodies.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

Austria has competitive political parties that form and operate without encountering undue obstacles. Recent years have seen the rise and fall of various competing parties and coalitions through democratic processes.

Opposition parties have a realistic opportunity to gain representation. Until recently, Austria has often been governed by grand coalitions, a trend that has fostered some public disillusionment with the political process. An ÖVP–FPÖ government, which collapsed in 2019, was succeeded by an ÖVP–Green Party coalition in January 2020.

Within months of forming, People Freedom Fundamental Rights (MFG)—a so-called antilockdown party focused on opposing COVID-19-related restrictions—was able to gain enough votes to enter the state parliament in Upper Austria in September 2021.

Austrians are generally free to make their own political choices without pressure from any groups that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The participation of Slovene, Hungarian, and Romany minorities in local government remains limited. There is little minority representation in the legislature. The number of people who have been naturalized has fallen since the establishment of a more restrictive national integration policy in 2009. To qualify for naturalization, individuals must have lived in Austria for 10 years—including 5 as a permanent resident—as well as provide proof of regular income and renounce their existing citizenship.

Several parties include support for gender equality in their platforms. In the 2019 elections, 39 percent of the members elected to the parliament were women, a slight increase compared to 2017. The country's first majority-female cabinet was appointed in January 2020.

Non-Austrian EU citizens are entitled to vote in municipal elections as well as in European Parliament elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected president and legislative representatives work with the chancellor, vice chancellor, and cabinet ministers to determine the policies of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Public-sector corruption is problematic, and the political class is widely perceived as corrupt. The Council of Europe (CoE)'s Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) has criticized Austria for failing to regulate lobbying and prevent corruption.

Investigations related to Ibizagate—which began with the 2019 release of a video of then FPÖ leader Heinz-Christian Strache offering state contracts in exchange for donations and favorable media coverage—continued in 2021 and 2022. Strache was found guilty of corruption in August 2021 and given a 15-month suspended sentence. An appeal was pending as of year-end 2022. Strache was also tried on separate corruption charges in June 2022, based on allegations that he had awarded board positions at a state-owned company in return for donations to an FPÖ-linked organization. He was acquitted in July.

In recent years, the corruption prosecutor's office has investigated numerous allegations of false testimony, bribery, and corruption involving senior FPÖ and ÖVP politicians, including former chancellor Kurz. High-level corruption investigations continued in 2022, including into the president of the National Council, Wolfgang Sobotka, who has been implicated in numerous corruption scandals.

Following a 2019 EU directive requiring member states to pass laws implementing rights and obligations regarding whistleblowers, the government drafted a bill in June 2022 that would introduce far-reaching measures to protect whistleblowers. The act had not been passed at year's end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Austria's government has frequently been criticized for inadequate transparency. Official secrecy remains enshrined in the constitution, and Austria's overall legal framework on access to information is weak.

In February 2021, the ÖVP–Green Party government agreed on a draft Freedom of Information Act, which would provide for the end of official secrecy; the draft had not passed as of year-end 2022. The draft legislation has been criticized as weak and overly narrow by information rights groups.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The federal constitution and the Media Law of 1981 provide the basis for free media in Austria. However, libel and slander laws protect politicians and government officials, many of whom—particularly members of the FPÖ—have filed defamation suits in recent years. Media ownership remains highly concentrated, particularly in the provinces, and the government exerts some influence on the state broadcaster, the Austrian Broadcasting Corporation (ORF).

Media outlets are eligible to receive government funding through advertising and in the form of press subsidies intended to ensure media diversity. In March 2022, a broad parliamentary majority approved amendments to a 2004 media financing law, including reforms making €20 million in government funding available annually.

In 2021, several ÖVP politicians resigned over allegations of having purchased favorable news coverage during the 2017 elections. Former family minister Sophie Karmasin was arrested on corruption charges related to the scandal in March 2022.

While there is no official censorship, Austrian law prohibits any form of neo-Nazism or antisemitism, as well as the public denial, approval, or justification of Nazi crimes, including the Holocaust.

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed. Austrian law divides religious organizations into three legal categories: officially recognized religious societies, religious confessional communities, and associations. Many religious minority groups allege that the law impedes their legitimate claims for recognition and demotes them to second-class status.

Foreign funding for Muslim houses of worship and imams is prohibited by a 2015 law; Orthodox Christian and Jewish groups with similarly strong links to communities abroad face no such restrictions. The FPÖ has been criticized for stoking anti-Muslim sentiment through controversial advertising campaigns. In recent years, antisemitic and anti-Islamic tendencies have become more prevalent.

Nearly 1,000 antisemitic attacks were recorded during 2021—a more than 65 percent increase over those recorded in 2020. According to the Jewish Community of Vienna (IKG), the number of antisemitic incidents reported in the first half of 2022 marked a 32 percent decrease compared to the same period in 2021. In 2021, the ÖVP–Green government established a new staff unit in the fight against antisemitism. In May 2022, representatives from 15 European Union (EU) member states met in Vienna to discuss standardizing the recording of antisemitic incidents and crimes.

Academic freedom is generally upheld, and the educational system is free from extensive political indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion in Austria is generally free and unrestricted. However, there have been some difficulties related to the balance between ensuring freedom of speech and enforcing legal prohibitions on hate speech.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected and respected in practice. However, beginning in March 2020, assemblies were periodically subject to strict regulation under COVID-19-related public health measures. In March 2022, the government lifted most remaining restrictions, including limits on event sizes.

Despite COVID-19-related restrictions on public gatherings, large protests against lockdown measures were held throughout 2020 and 2021. Demonstrations against COVID-19-related restrictions, including some against the government's vaccine mandate, continued into 2022.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate without restrictions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions are free to organize and to strike, and they are considered an essential partner in national policymaking. According to government statistics, some 1.2 million workers are members of trade unions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent, and is generally held in high regard among Austrians. The Constitutional Court examines the compatibility of legislation with the constitution without political influence or interference.

Austrian judges are appointed by the executive instead of a politically independent body, which the CoE has criticized as an insufficient separation of the state government from the judiciary.

In recent years, ÖVP officials have drawn criticism for allegedly attempting to obstruct judicial investigations into corruption allegations involving ÖVP politicians.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Due process generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. However, scandals involving Austria's intelligence apparatus in recent years raised concerns about the potential politicization of the justice system, and respect for due process.

People in Austria are generally free from the illegitimate use of physical force, war, and insurgencies. However, terrorist threats are a concern, and counterterrorism agencies have been found to "lack sufficient capacity" to adequately address existing risks.

The number of right-wing extremist crimes reported in Austria rose sharply during the COVID-19 pandemic, peaking in 2021 with more than 1,000 such crimes reported. In April 2022, security forces seized Nazi memorabilia and illegal weapons stockpiles from far-right groups while conducting raids across the country.

Conditions in prisons generally meet high European standards.

Some groups face difficulty exercising their human rights before the law. Strong rhetoric has been directed against refugees and migrants in recent years. Some asylum seekers can be deported while appeals are pending. In recent years, international organizations have criticized the Austrian asylum system for failing to meet international standards. Continuing deportations during the COVID-19 pandemic and, in 2022, ÖVP attempts to exclude asylum seekers from receiving certain forms of state aid have led to conflict between the coalition partners.

LGBT+ people face some societal discrimination. Although hate crime legislation prohibits incitement based on sexual orientation, no law prohibits service providers from denying services on that basis. In May 2022, the government amended blood donation regulations, removing restrictions that had previously prevented gay and bisexual men from donating blood.

Despite some improvement, gender equality remains an issue in Austria. According to Eurostat, Austria's gender wage gap of nearly 19 percent is among the largest in the EU.

Several members of Austria's armed forces have faced disciplinary proceedings and criminal charges in recent years for allegedly engaging in far-right extremist activities. In late 2022, government officials promised to pursue legal reforms mandating the automatic dismissal of any public employee convicted of violating the ban on the use of Nazi symbols.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Austrian citizens generally enjoy freedom of movement. However, restrictions were periodically imposed between March 2020 and March 2022 to curb the spread of COVID-19.

Roma and other ethnic minorities face discrimination in the labor and housing markets. The Labor Ministry has sought to promote integration of younger immigrants by providing German-language courses and job training.

Austrians may freely exercise the right to own property and establish businesses.

Same-sex marriage became legal in Austria in 2019. Restrictions on same-sex couples adopting children ended in 2016.

The 2009 Second Protection Against Violence Act increased penalties for perpetrators of domestic violence and authorized further punitive measures against chronic offenders. However, gender-based violence remains a problem; Austria has one of the highest rates of femicide in the EU.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

A 1979 law guarantees women's freedom from discrimination in various areas, including the workplace.

In June 2022, Austrian police announced that an antitrafficking investigation had uncovered a large-scale labor trafficking operation in which more than 230 Iraqi asylum seekers had been forced to work in illegal conditions and subjected to systematic wage theft.

Azerbaijan

Population: 10,200,000
Capital: Baku
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Nagorno-Karabakh, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology.

Overview: Power in Azerbaijan's authoritarian regime remains heavily concentrated in the hands of Ilham Aliyev, who has served as president since 2003, and his extended family. Corruption is rampant, and the formal political opposition has been weakened by years of persecution. The authorities have carried out an extensive crackdown on civil liberties in recent years, leaving little room for independent expression or activism. Azerbaijan won control of a third of the territory of Nagorno-Karabakh along with some adjacent land during a weeks-long conflict with Armenia in 2020, at the cost of over 2,900 soldiers.

- Clashes between Azerbaijani and Armenian military forces continued during the year. The military conflict escalated when Azerbaijani troops entered Armenia in September; active fighting took place over a two-day period and reportedly resulted in the deaths of nearly 100 Azerbaijani soldiers and over 200 Armenian soldiers.
- A draft law regulating political parties was introduced in the Milli Mejlis in September. The opposition expressed concern that the legislation, which remained awaiting presidential approval at year's end, was created to stifle dissent and limit the ability of opposition parties to operate.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is directly elected for seven-year terms. There are no term limits. Since the early 1990s, elections have not been considered credible or competitive by international observers. President Ilham Aliyev—who succeeded his father, Heydar, in 2003—won a fourth term with some 86 percent of the vote amid evidence of electoral fraud and a boycott by the main opposition parties. Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) observers found that the election lacked genuine competition due to a restrictive political environment in which the seven nominal opposition candidates did not openly confront or criticize the president.

In 2017, President Aliyev appointed his wife, Mehriban Aliyeva, as vice president. The post was created via constitutional changes that were pushed through in 2016 without meaningful parliamentary debate or public consultation.

The prime minister and cabinet are appointed and dismissed by the president. Prime Minister Ali Asadov was appointed in 2019.

The 125 seats in Azerbaijan's unicameral Milli Mejlis, or National Assembly, are filled through elections in single-member districts, with members serving five-year terms.

Aliyev dissolved the parliament in December 2019, and snap elections were held in February 2020. The ruling New Azerbaijan Party (YAP) won 70 parliamentary seats, while independents won 41 and the remainder were won by smaller parties; contests for 4 seats were not immediately decided. Turnout stood at 46.8 percent. A major opposition alliance, the National Council of Democratic Forces, boycotted the elections. OSCE monitors criticized the conduct of the poll, noting procedural and tabulation concerns and ultimately questioning "whether the results were established honestly."

The electoral laws and framework fall short of international standards and do not ensure free and fair elections. The nomination process for members of electoral commissions places the bodies under the influence of the ruling party. Commission members have been known to unlawfully interfere with the election process and obstruct the activities of observers. Complaints of electoral violations do not receive adequate or impartial treatment.

Election observers have repeatedly condemned restrictions on freedom of assembly, the inability of candidates to obtain permission to hold rallies or appear on television, political interference with courts investigating electoral violations, and noncompliance with past European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) decisions on election issues. OSCE monitors present during the February 2020 parliamentary elections noted pervasive electoral misconduct, including verbal and physical abuse directed against candidates' representatives and monitors.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

The political environment in Azerbaijan is neither pluralistic nor competitive. The ability of opposition parties to operate and engage with the public is limited by the dominance of the YAP. A number of laws restrict candidates' efforts to organize and hold rallies, and the opposition has virtually no access to coverage on television, which remains the most popular news source. The regime has cracked down violently on any Islamic political movement that reaches national prominence.

Political dialogue between the government and the opposition began in 2020, resulting in the creation of new political parties for the first time since 2011. Another two parties were registered in 2021 as part of the process, which has been presented by the government as a "new political configuration." However, critics say that the new parties are not genuine opposition groups and that the dialogue has been dominated by the government.

In September 2022, a draft law regulating political parties was introduced in the Milli Mejlis. If adopted, the legislation would impose numerous new restrictions on the activities of political parties in Azerbaijan. Among other things, the bill included provisions requiring that new political parties have 200 founding members, each of whom has lived in Azerbaijan without interruption for the previous 20 years. Critics say the draft law is intended to stifle dissent, and would affect the ability of existing opposition parties to operate as well as prevent new parties from forming. The bill passed its first reading in the parliament in November, and remained awaiting presidential approval at year's end.

The Aliyev family has held the presidency since 1993. The biased electoral framework and repressive media and political environment effectively make it impossible for opposition parties to gain power through elections. The traditional opposition parties boycotted the most recent parliamentary, presidential, and municipal elections rather than take part in an unfair process.

Opposition politicians and party officials are subject to arbitrary arrest on dubious charges, physical violence, and intimidation. In 2021, Niyameddin Ahmedov, a member of the opposition Popular Front Party of Azerbaijan (AXFP), was sentenced to 13 years in prison for financing terrorism, a charge his lawyers called politically motivated.

The authoritarian system in Azerbaijan excludes the public from any genuine and autonomous political participation. The regime relies on abuse of state resources, corrupt patronage networks, and control over the security forces and criminal justice system to maintain its political dominance.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The political system does not allow women or minority groups to organize independently or advocate for their respective interests. There are no meaningful mechanisms to promote increased representation of women and ethnic or religious minorities. The government has worked to stifle public expressions of ethnic Talysh and Lezgin identity, among other targeted groups.

Internally displaced persons (IDPs) who left Nagorno-Karabakh and settled in other parts of Azerbaijan after the 1994 cease-fire have been unable to participate in municipal elections where they subsequently settled and are instead directed to vote for their former districts.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

Neither the president nor members of parliament are freely or fairly elected, and the parliament is unable to serve as a meaningful check on the powerful presidency. Lawmakers and lower-level elected officials essentially carry out the instructions of the ruling party.

Corruption is pervasive. In the absence of a free press and independent judiciary, officials are held accountable for corrupt behavior only when it suits the needs of a more powerful or well-connected figure. In 2022, multiple high-ranking officials were arrested on corruption charges in the Azerbaijani exclave of Nakhchivan.

Investigative reports published by foreign media in recent years have revealed evidence that the Aliyev family has used their positions to amass large private fortunes. The resources were reportedly used in part to improperly influence the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe in order to minimize criticism of electoral conduct and alleged rights abuses. In 2021, the Pandora Papers—an investigation by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists (ICIJ)—revealed that a network of offshore companies linked to Aliyev's family had traded around £400 million ($522.1 million) in property in the United Kingdom since 2006.

In June 2022, independent news outlet Abzas Media released a report showing that businesses connected to high-ranking officials—including companies linked to Aliyev's wife and daughters—have been awarded government contracts to develop agricultural land on the territories Azerbaijan gained during the 2020 Nagorno-Karabakh conflict.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government operations are opaque. Although public officials are nominally required to submit financial disclosure reports, procedures and compliance remain unclear, and the reports are not publicly accessible. There are legal guarantees for citizens' access to information, but also broad exceptions to this right, and authorities at all levels systematically refuse to respond to information requests.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 7 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Constitutional guarantees for press freedom are routinely and systematically violated, as the government works to maintain a tight grip on the information landscape. Defamation remains a criminal offense. Legal amendments passed in 2017 extended government control over online media, allowing blocking of websites without a court order if they are deemed to contain content that poses a danger to the state or society. Independent news sites are regularly blocked or struck with cyberattacks.

Journalists face detention or imprisonment on false charges, along with travel bans. In late 2020, Polad Aslanov, editor in chief of news sites Xeberman and Press-az, received a 16-year prison sentence for selling state secrets to Iran. Aslanov claimed that he was targeted for reporting on corruption.

Journalists also risk surveillance. In 2021, the Organized Crime and Corruption Reporting Project (OCCRP) reported that Azerbaijani journalists were among those targeted with the Pegasus spyware tool, which was likely supplied to the Azerbaijani government.

In 2021, Aliyev issued a presidential decree that called for "media reforms" and created a new media body, the Media Development Agency (MEDIA). That December, the parliament passed a bill authored with MEDIA's involvement that, among other things, requires journalists to register with the authorities and media owners to reside in Azerbaijan. Local and international media rights groups criticized the legislation, which was approved by Aliyev in February 2022.

Journalists—and their relatives—face harassment, violence, and intimidation, including by authorities. In February 2022, journalist Fatima Movlamli reported being beaten by police after refusing to delete a recording she made while covering a protest. Journalist Ayten Mammadova was attacked by an unknown man because of her work in May. The assailant threatened Mammadova and her young child with a knife, and demanded that Mammadova cease her coverage of an unnamed trial.

The regime exercises control over religion through state-affiliated entities such as the Caucasus Muslim Board. Religious communities that attempt to operate independently face burdensome registration requirements, interference with the importation and distribution of printed religious materials, and arrest and harassment of religious leaders with international ties or a significant following. For example, members of the Muslim Unity Movement, a nonviolent conservative Shiite group, have been subjected to mass arrests, torture, and imprisonment as part of a crackdown that began in 2015.

A number of mosques have been closed in recent years, ostensibly for registration or safety violations. Jehovah's Witnesses face harassment as well as prosecution for evading military service.

The authorities have long curtailed academic freedom. Some educators have reported being dismissed for links to opposition groups, and students have faced expulsion and other punishments for similar reasons. The Azerbaijani history curriculum is known to include negative and discriminatory references to Armenians.

Law enforcement bodies monitor private telephone and online communications—particularly of activists, political figures, and foreign nationals—without judicial oversight. The escalation of government persecution of critics and their families has undermined the assumption of privacy among ordinary residents and eroded the openness of private discussion. Even state officials have been punished for their and their family members' social media activity, and activists have been imprisoned—on unrelated, fabricated charges—for critical Facebook posts. In recent years, activists have been targeted by spear-phishing campaigns designed to install malicious software on their computers or steal personal information. Activists report that harassment on social media, often highly sexualized for women activists, is commonplace.

Social media users and antiwar activists who signed a statement calling for a peaceful resolution to the 2020 conflict over control of Nagorno-Karabakh were harassed and threatened online, prompting at least one activist to remove their signature.

In 2021, the OCCRP reported that people who had casual or familial connections to activists and journalists were targeted with Pegasus.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The law imposes tight restrictions on freedom of assembly, which is contingent on the protection of "public order and morals." Activists have complained that in practice, the obstacles to public gatherings include additional, extralegal measures. Unsanctioned assemblies can draw a harsh police response and fines for participants, and the government largely stopped issuing permits for rallies in Baku in 2019. Even when permits are issued, the government typically confines demonstrations to relatively isolated locations, where it can track attendees through facial-recognition technology and mobile-phone data.

In May 2022, about 30 people were detained prior to a planned antigovernment protest, organized by activists in response to several incidents in which the rights of opposition politicians, journalists, and members of civil society had been violated.

Unlike in previous years, the police did not prevent a rally held by women's rights activists on International Women's Day in March. However, several participants reported that police mistreated LGBT+ activists and confiscated pro-LGBT+ flags and placards on the day of the march.

Repressive laws on nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have been used to pressure both local and foreign organizations, many of which have suspended operations when their bank accounts were frozen or their offices raided. Nearly all organizations or networks that work on human rights are forced by the state to operate in a legal gray zone. The government has refused to permit the European Union to provide grant support for local civil society groups. Civic activists are routinely subjected to harassment, intimidation, detention, and abuse by police.

Activists also risk surveillance; a 2021 OCCRP report noted that over 40 Azerbaijani activists were likely targeted with Pegasus, along with family members.

Several activists were arrested on spurious charges during 2022. Human rights defender Bakhtiyar Hajiyev was arrested on hooliganism charges in December; his lawyer called the charges "manufactured," saying they were connected to his activism. More than 30 people were detained during a rally held in support of Hajiyev the same month, including prominent opposition activist Tofig Yagublu. Yagublu was convicted of "petty hooliganism" and "disobeying the police" the same day he was arrested. Both Hajiyev and Yagublu remained in detention at year's end.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Although the law permits the formation of trade unions and the right to strike, the majority of unions remain closely affiliated with the government, and many categories of workers are prohibited from striking. Most major industries are dominated by state-owned enterprises, in which the government controls wages and working conditions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is corrupt and subservient to the executive. Judges are appointed by the parliament on the proposal of the president. The courts' lack of political independence is especially evident in the many trumped-up or otherwise flawed cases brought against opposition figures, activists, and critical journalists.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are not upheld. Arbitrary arrest and detention are common, and detainees are often held for long periods before trial. Political detainees have reported restricted access to legal counsel, fabrication and withholding of evidence, and physical abuse to extract confessions.

Although nominally independent, the Azerbaijani Bar Association (AVK) acts on the orders of the Ministry of Justice and is complicit in the harassment of human rights lawyers. Legal amendments that took effect in 2018 stipulated that only AVK members could represent clients in court. Since then, the association has disbarred, suspended, or threatened most of the country's active human rights lawyers for speaking to the media about violations of their clients' rights. In nearly all disciplinary cases, the courts have upheld AVK decisions without a thorough assessment or public justification.

International observers have consistently concluded that both torture and impunity for the perpetrators of such abuse are endemic in the Azerbaijani criminal justice system. Police regularly administer beatings during arrest or while breaking up protests. Prison conditions are substandard. Medical care is generally inadequate, and overcrowding is common.

Azerbaijanis were affected by armed conflict with Armenia during 2020. The two countries engaged in a full-scale conflict over control of Nagorno-Karabakh that September. The conflict ended that November after a Russian-brokered cease-fire was agreed; under its terms, Azerbaijan would retain control of parts of Nagorno-Karabakh gained during the fighting, along with adjacent land held by Armenia. Baku reported that approximately 2,900 soldiers died in the fighting, while at least 146 civilians on both sides were killed. The conflict was marked by reported acts of mistreatment, desecration, and vandalism. Azerbaijani forces have been accused of physically abusing Armenian prisoners of war (POWs).

Military clashes between Azerbaijan and Armenia continued during 2022. In September, Azerbaijani military forces entered Armenian territory. The escalation of the ongoing military conflict reportedly resulted in the deaths of nearly 100 Azerbaijani soldiers and over 200 Armenian soldiers. Active fighting took place over a two-day period, though the subsequent cease-fire has been regularly violated. Official reports included credible evidence that Azerbaijani troops had committed war crimes.

Members of ethnic minority groups have complained of discrimination in areas including education, employment, and housing. Women are subject to discrimination in employment, including both de facto bias and formal exclusion from certain types of work under the labor code.

While IDPs from the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict that ended in 1994 are entitled to special assistance, they face severe infringements on their economic and social rights and freedom of movement. Many are housed in dormitories or substandard housing and are unable to change their place of residence, which is often located out of range of sources of employment or adequate medical care.

Although same-sex sexual activity is legal, LGBT+ people experience societal discrimination and risk harassment by the police. In 2017, police fined or detained dozens of people for weeks in a coordinated crackdown that led many LGBT+ residents to flee the country. In recent years, local and international NGOs have called on the authorities to investigate anti-LGBT+ attacks and take measures to protect LGBT+ individuals. In February 2022, openly gay LGBT+ activist Avaz Shikhmammadov—known as Avaz Hafizli—was murdered by his cousin, Amrulla Gulaliyev, who confessed to killing Hafizli because of his sexual orientation. Gulaliyev was sentenced to nine years and six months in prison in July. Activists noted that Hafizli's murder was not prosecuted as a hate crime.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

The government restricts freedom of movement, particularly foreign travel, for opposition politicians, journalists, and civil society activists. While travel bans were lifted for some dissidents during 2019, many others remained in place, including for some of the political prisoners released that year; others fled the country to avoid further persecution. Some travel bans remained in effect in 2022 and were extended to the families of political emigrants.

IDPs from the previous Nagorno-Karabakh conflict enjoy freedom of movement in law, but not in practice. IDPs are legally registered at their place of initial resettlement, which are sometimes in rural areas and far from any source of employment. The process of changing registration is difficult, and IDPs who change their place of registration risk losing their status and accompanying state assistance. As a result, many families are separated, with usually male wage-earners relocating to urban centers for work while their families remain at their place of registration. In 2021, President Aliyev established the Karabakh Revival Fund, which is meant to finance infrastructure development in Nagorno-Karabakh to allow IDPs to return there. During 2022, several families who had been displaced in the 1990s were resettled on the territory taken by Azerbaijan following the 2020 Nagorno-Karabakh conflict.

Most of Azerbaijan's land borders remained closed into 2022, ostensibly for COVID-19-related reasons. Following the Russian military invasion of Ukraine in February, flights between Russia and Azerbaijan were suspended, which, combined with the land border closures, left many Azerbaijanis living in Russia unable to return to Azerbaijan during the year.

People with disabilities and psychiatric patients are routinely institutionalized; there is no clear procedure to review their confinement.

Property rights are affected by government-backed development projects that often entail forced evictions, unlawful expropriations, and demolitions with little or no notice. Corruption and the economic dominance of state-owned companies and politically connected elites pose obstacles to ordinary private business activity.

The law generally grants women and men the same rights on personal status matters such as marriage, divorce, and child custody. Domestic violence is a notable problem, and related legal protections are inadequate. Conservative social norms contribute to the widespread view that domestic violence is a private matter, which discourages victims from reporting perpetrators to the police. However, the growth of social media and the movement of rural populations to Baku in recent years have spurred public discussion of the issue.

Gender-based violence is a persistent problem. Sexual assaults frequently go unreported, and those that are reported often are not prosecuted.

In 2021, new legislation imposing mandatory mediation on those seeking to divorce came into force. The law introduces a number of obstacles for those wishing to divorce, especially for people outside of large cities who may not have access to official mediation services. Critics say that the law will disproportionately disadvantage people who cannot secure legal representation or those who are otherwise vulnerable, such as survivors of domestic abuse attempting to divorce their abuser.

Legal safeguards against exploitative working conditions are poorly enforced, and many employers reportedly ignore them without penalty. Children are vulnerable to sexual exploitation and forced labor.

The government has taken some steps to combat forced labor and sex trafficking, including by prosecuting traffickers and providing services to victims, but the problem persists, notably among Romany children and foreign household workers. The authorities extended a preexisting moratorium on labor inspections through the end of 2021.

As a result of corruption and a lack of public accountability for the allocation of resources, the state's oil and gas revenues tend to benefit privileged elites rather than the general population, narrowing access to economic opportunity.

The Bahamas

Population: 400,000
Capital: Nassau
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Bahamas is a stable democracy where political rights and civil liberties are generally respected. However, the islands have a relatively high homicide rate. Harsh immigration policies, which mainly affect Haitian-Bahamians and Haitian migrants, are often executed in the absence of due process. Government corruption is a serious problem that is thought to have had significant economic consequences.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, opposition lawmaker Adrian Gibson was charged with abuse of power over his conduct as chairman of the Water and Sewerage Corporation (WSC). His trial is expected to begin in 2023.
- In August, Attorney General L. Ryan Pinder said the government would amend the Bahamas Nationality Act to bring gender equality to citizenship.
- In September, Prime Minister Philip Davis said the government would hold a referendum on whether The Bahamas should become a republic but did not specify a date. The British monarch is currently the head of state.
- Sam Bankman-Fried, chief executive of the Bahamas-headquartered cryptocurrency exchange FTX, was arrested and extradited to the United States in December, a month after the firm filed for bankruptcy in a US court. FTX lawyers accused Bahamian regulators of colluding with Bankman-Fried to impact the firm's bankruptcy proceedings in December, while the government vehemently objected to criticism of its conduct.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Bahamas is governed under a parliamentary system, and a mostly ceremonial governor-general is appointed by the British monarch as head of state.

The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the governor-general; the office is usually held by the leader of the largest party in Parliament or the head of a parliamentary coalition. In September 2021, Philip Davis became prime minister after the Progressive Liberal Party (PLP) won that month's parliamentary election.

Members of the lower chamber of the bicameral Parliament, the 39-member House of Assembly, are directly elected to five-year terms. The 16 members of the Senate are appointed for five-year terms by the governor-general based on recommendations made by the prime minister and the opposition leader.

The PLP won 32 House of Assembly seats in the September 2021 elections, defeating the ruling Free National Movement (FNM). The Coalition of Independents and the Democratic National Alliance respectively won over 6 and 1 percent of the vote but won no seats. Turnout stood at 65 percent, a relatively low figure. Organization of American States (OAS) monitors praised the electoral process and COVID-19-related protocols.

The electoral process is regulated by the Parliamentary Elections Act (PEA) and generally well managed by the Parliamentary Registration Department. The parliamentary commissioner heads the department and is appointed by the governor-general acting on the recommendation of the prime minister after consultation with the opposition leader.

After the PEA was amended in 2020, electoral authorities implemented a continuous voter register, which was used in the 2021 polls. In its postelectoral report, the OAS warned that individuals who were not included in the 2017 voter list or who did not register by the August 2021 election announcement may have been disenfranchised. The OAS reiterated prior calls to digitize voter registration and issue campaign-finance regulations.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

Political parties organize freely and operate unhindered. However, as electoral financing is not regulated, there is no legal obligation to disclose funding sources and no limit on campaign spending.

Opposition parties operate without undue interference. Political power has alternated between the PLP and the FNM since the country achieved independence in 1973.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and candidates are generally able to exercise their political choices freely. However, a lack of campaign-finance regulations leaves open avenues for the outsized role of money in politics.

Only citizens may vote, and protracted citizenship and naturalization proceedings make achieving citizenship difficult for children born in The Bahamas to foreign parents. This predominantly affects children of Haitian immigrants.

Women are politically underrepresented. In its 2021 postelectoral report, the OAS noted that women do not often seek office, in part due to "gendered perceptions of politics" and social pressure. The OAS nevertheless noted an increase in women candidates. Seven women won House of Assembly seats. Four women were appointed to the Senate. Women additionally serve as speakers of both houses.

Openly LGBT+ people are not overtly represented in politics.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Freely elected officials are generally unhindered in determining policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Anticorruption mechanisms are relatively weak. There is no agency specifically empowered to handle allegations of government corruption. Rates of reporting corruption are low, as whistleblowers fear retaliation. The PLP vowed to establish an independent anticorruption body and an ombudsman after taking power but did not do so by the end of 2022.

In June 2022, FNM parliamentarian Adrian Gibson was charged with abuse of power while he served as chairman of the WSC. Gibson had stepped down as chairman in 2021 after facing allegations of misconduct. His trial is expected to begin in 2023.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Government procurement processes lack transparency, and political parties and campaigns are not required to disclose their finances. Legislators and other high-ranking public officials must disclose their income and assets annually under the Public Disclosure Act but often fail to submit the required information on time, without penalty.

The Fiscal Responsibility Act (FRA) of 2019 aims to improve transparency of public-sector spending. The FRA created an independent oversight and enforcement body, the Fiscal Responsibility Council. The Public Procurement Act (PPA), which is meant to ensure transparency in government contracts, took effect in 2021. In October 2022, Prime Minister Davis tabled a new bill to replace the PPA, calling it "deficient."

The Bahamian government faced criticism over the collapse of FTX, a major cryptocurrency exchange that filed for bankruptcy in the United States in November 2022. FTX collapsed after a press report suggested that chief executive Sam Bankman-Fried used FTX's cryptocurrency as collateral in other loans, prompting customers to withdraw from the exchange. In early November, the Securities Commission of The Bahamas (SCB) called on the national police to investigate FTX over concerns that it was mismanaging assets in a manner that amounted to a crime. In December, the SCB disclosed that it had seized FTX assets worth $3.5 billion in November and said it would return those assets to creditors and customers. The firm's lawyers accused Bahamian regulators of colluding with Bankman-Fried to impact bankruptcy proceedings. The government in Nassau, meanwhile, vehemently objected to criticism of its conduct regarding FTX.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 53 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Press freedom in The Bahamas is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice. Privately owned newspapers and radio broadcasters freely express a variety of views, although partisanship is common. Libel is a rarely enforced criminal offense punishable by up to two years in prison.

Religious freedom is generally respected.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic institutions are generally free from political pressure and other interference.

People can freely express their views without fear of retribution or surveillance. However, ordinary Bahamians can face libel charges.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected and is respected in practice.

Prince William and Princess Catherine of the United Kingdom visited The Bahamas in March 2022; protesters called for reparations for slavery during that visit. In October, Lincoln Bain, leader of the Coalition of Independents, and eight supporters were arrested after police tried to move their protest away from the steps of Parliament, which the protesters allegedly resisted.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is generally protected, and a variety of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in the country. A 2019 NGO registration law required NGOs to declare sources of contributions and donations and account for annual income and expenditures.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Labor, business, and professional organizations are generally free from government interference. Unions have the right to strike, and collective bargaining is prevalent.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judicial system is headed by the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court, with the additional right of appeal to the London-based Privy Council under certain circumstances.

The Bahamian judiciary is independent. In 2021, the Bahamas Bar Association called for legislation to better codify judicial independence. The Inter-American Development Bank has suggested separating the public prosecutor and attorney general's offices to ensure independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process in civil and criminal matters generally prevails. However, the government only appoints counsel to defendants in capital cases, leaving some people without legal representation.

Homicide and violent crime rates in The Bahamas remain among the highest in the Caribbean. In August 2022, Police Commissioner Clayton Fernander said there were 85 murders over the year to date, a 21 percent increase over the same period in 2021. However, state security agents generally do not engage in the illegal use of force against civilians, and the population is not threatened by large-scale violence or insurgencies. Prison conditions, meanwhile, are poor.

The constitution does not prohibit discrimination based on gender or sexual orientation. LGBT+ people continue to report discrimination in employment and housing. LGBT+ advocates celebrated the country's third annual Pride week in October 2022.

Harsh immigration policies enacted in 2014 target Haitian-Bahamians and Haitian migrants, requiring them to carry a passport and residency permits. The government prioritizes Bahamian citizens for hiring, land grants, and shelter in hurricane relief centers, and has pursued removal of shantytowns that primarily house migrants.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The freedom of movement is protected. Migrants and Haitian-Bahamians' ability to move freely is affected by their lack of Bahamian identity documents, however.

Roadblocks have been erected as part of immigration enforcement actions.

The country has a strong private sector, and the economy relies mostly on tourism and financial services. Individuals are free to establish businesses.

The government has worked to dismantle shantytowns in recent years. In 2021, a Supreme Court judge expanded an existing injunction to prohibit the dismantlement of any unregulated community in Abaco. In October 2022, Attorney General Pinder said the government was preparing contempt proceedings over structures that were erected in Abaco in apparent violation of that injunction. That same month, the Spanish Wells Commonage Committee announced a one-year construction ban in the Blackwood shantytown.

The government does not place explicit restrictions on social freedoms. However, the constitution distinguishes between Bahamian men and women in the transmission of citizenship to a spouse or child, resulting in distinctions in treatment of married Bahamian women's children and their foreign-born husbands.

In a 2020 ruling, the Supreme Court affirmed the granting of Bahamian citizenship to a Bahamian-born child regardless of the gender or marital status of their Bahamian parent. The Court of Appeal upheld that ruling in 2021. The former FNM government vowed to appeal to the Privy Council. In August 2022, Pinder said the incumbent PLP government would legislate to allow men and women to pass citizenship onto children.

Violence against women, including domestic violence and marital rape, is a serious issue. Same-sex marriage is not legalized.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The Bahamas is a source, destination, and transit country for forced labor and sexual exploitation. According to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2022, the government made significant efforts to address trafficking. Migrant workers, many of whom arrive in The Bahamas to work in the agricultural sector and in domestic services, are particularly vulnerable to exploitation.

Bahrain

Population: 1,500,000
Capital: Manama
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Bahrain's Sunni-led monarchy dominates state institutions, and elections for the lower house of parliament are neither competitive nor inclusive. Since violently crushing a popular prodemocracy protest movement in 2011, the authorities have systematically eliminated a broad range of political rights and civil liberties, dismantled the political opposition, and cracked down on persistent dissent concentrated among the Shiite population.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, the king ordered a major cabinet reshuffle, changing 17 of 22 ministers, adding more women to the cabinet, and including only three ministers from the ruling family. Three ministries changed hands in a smaller shuffle in November.
- Elections for the lower house of parliament were held in November, but with opposition groups still banned, the resulting legislature was reliably supportive of the government.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The 2002 constitution gives the king power over the executive, legislative, and judicial authorities. The monarch appoints and dismisses the prime minister and cabinet members, who are responsible to him rather than the legislature. Khalifa bin Salman al-Khalifa, the uncle of the current king, Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifa, was the country's only prime minister between independence from Britain in 1971 and his death in 2020. The crown prince and eldest son of the king, Salman bin Hamad al-Khalifa, was appointed prime minister that year, and he retained the role after a cabinet reshuffle that followed the November 2022 parliamentary elections.

The king appoints the 40-member Consultative Council, the upper house of the National Assembly. The lower house, or Council of Representatives, consists of 40 elected members serving four-year terms. Formal political parties are not permitted, but members of "political societies" have participated in elections.

Elections for the lower house were held in November 2022. The polls were uncompetitive due to bans on major opposition groups. A law adopted in 2018 prohibited the candidacy of anyone who belonged to dissolved political societies, had boycotted or been expelled from the parliament, or had received a prison sentence of at least six months. Political societies in general performed poorly in the 2022 elections, with most seats going to independents, including Sunni Islamists.

Bahrain's electoral framework is unfair, with electoral districts deliberately designed to underrepresent Shiites, who form a majority of the citizen population but have never been able to obtain majority representation in the parliament. The government has also allegedly drawn district borders to put certain political societies, including leftist and Sunni Islamist groups, at a disadvantage. The government directorate responsible for administering elections is headed by the justice minister, who is appointed by the crown prince, and it is not an independent body.

Voters' passports are stamped to indicate that they have voted, and there is a widespread belief that people who do not have these stamps are at a higher risk of being prevented from travelling. The government has previously punished people who call for election boycotts.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

Formal political parties are illegal. A 2005 law makes it illegal to form political associations based on class, profession, or religion, while a 2016 amendment prohibits serving religious clerics from engaging in political activity. The law permits "political societies," with some of the functions of a political party, to operate after registering with the government, but the authorities have closed almost all opposition political societies since 2016 and jailed many of their leaders. The most popular, the Shiite Islamist society Al-Wefaq, was forcibly disbanded that year for allegedly encouraging violence. The second-largest opposition group, the secularist National Democratic Action Society (Wa'ad), was banned in 2017. In 2018, the monarch banned individual members of dissolved groups from competing in elections.

Individual opposition leaders and activists routinely face harassment, and the regime has forced many into prison or exile. In 2019, the country's top court upheld a sentence of life in prison against Al-Wefaq general secretary Ali Salman, who was jailed in 2018 for alleged espionage on behalf of Qatar. He had been in detention on various charges since 2014.

The ruling family maintains a monopoly on political power through formal and informal positions, with the crown prince currently serving as prime minister. A major cabinet reshuffle in June 2022 left three additional members of the ruling family in the offices of deputy prime minister, minister of interior, and minister of finance and national economy, though this was a historically small share of cabinet seats for the family.

The constitutional system's structure excludes the possibility of a change in government through elections, and the parliament has been dominated by progovernment lawmakers since the dissolution of the main opposition societies and the imprisonment of many of their leaders.

The monarchy generally excludes the public from any meaningful or genuinely independent political participation. Since 2011 it has used the security forces to isolate the country's Shiite population and suppress political dissent. The royal court allegedly uses its patronage networks to influence candidates and elections.

Although Shiite Muslims make up a majority of the citizenry, they have tended to be underrepresented in the cabinet and parliament. The regime, which is controlled by a Sunni ruling family, has often viewed Shiites with suspicion and sought to prevent them from organizing to advance their political interests. Senior positions in politics and government are typically allocated to members of the ruling family and affiliated Sunni tribes. Certain wealthy Shiite families also enjoy a privileged position. After the June 2022 cabinet reshuffle, nine of the 25 ministers belonged to the Shiite majority, though none were associated with the political opposition.

Women formally enjoy full political rights but are marginalized in practice. A record high of eight women were elected to the lower house of parliament in November 2022, and five women served in the cabinet as of that month.

Noncitizens make up about half of the total population, and most have no political rights, but the minority of expatriates who own property in Bahrain can vote in municipal elections. Citizenship generally must be inherited from a Bahraini father, and foreign men married to Bahraini women do not have access to naturalization.

LGBT+ identity is generally not recognized openly, including in political contexts.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

There are no elected officials with executive authority. The National Assembly may propose legislation, but the government drafts and submits the bills for legislative consideration. As major opposition groups are absent from the National Assembly, the body has become silent on politically sensitive topics, though it does feature debate on economic reforms, austerity measures, subsidy reforms, and public services.

Bahrain is fiscally and economically dependent on Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, which gives their governments significant influence over its foreign policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

There are some laws in place to combat corruption, but enforcement is weak, and high-ranking officials or members of the ruling family who are suspected of corruption are rarely punished. The generally pliant parliament does not check malfeasance effectively, and the media are not sufficiently free to independently air allegations of corruption against powerful figures. Civil society anticorruption efforts are also restricted; activists who highlight such problems have been prohibited from traveling or otherwise harassed.

In January 2022, a court sentenced a civil servant to seven years in prison after convicting him of embezzling fees for the renewal of expatriates' residency permits; another defendant in the case was acquitted.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Parliamentary proceedings are public, and the parliament is entitled to scrutinize the government budget, but in practice the executive issues orders and laws without providing insight or allowing meaningful public consultation. The government does not publish regular and timely income or expenditure data. No access-to-information law has been adopted, and officials are not obliged to disclose their assets or income.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? −2 / 0

Over the past two decades, the government has made concerted efforts to erode the Shiite citizen majority and tip the country's demographic balance in favor of the Sunni minority, mostly by recruiting foreign-born Sunnis to serve in the security forces and become citizens. No data on the sectarian makeup of the population are made public.

Meanwhile, hundreds of Bahrainis have had their citizenship revoked in recent years, including a large number of Shiite leaders and activists. After a mass revocation in 2019 prompted international outcry, the monarch and courts restored the citizenship of hundreds of people, but those left out of the restoration included the most prominent opposition activists, and the government retains the authority to revoke citizenship without meaningful due process.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 10 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The government owns all national broadcast media outlets, and the private owners of Bahrain's main newspapers have close ties to the state. Self-censorship is encouraged by the vaguely worded Press Law, which allows the state to imprison journalists for criticizing the king or Islam or for threatening national security. Insulting the king is punishable by up to seven years' imprisonment. A 2016 edict requires newspapers to apply for a one-year renewable license to publish online. The government blocked access to Qatari news outlets between 2017, when diplomatic relations with Qatar were severed, and January 2021, when these ties were restored. Nonetheless, Al Jazeera remains inaccessible.

Journalists face legal and bureaucratic obstacles to their work in practice. The authorities have refused to renew the credentials of several Bahraini journalists working with foreign outlets. Five journalists remained imprisoned in 2022, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ). International journalists face difficulty obtaining an entry visa.

Islam is the state religion, and the penal code criminalizes blasphemy-related offenses. However, non-Muslim minority groups are generally free to practice their faiths. Both Muslim and non-Muslim religious groups are required to register with government ministries. In November 2022, Pope Francis became the first Roman Catholic pontiff to travel to Bahrain, the home of the Persian Gulf's first and largest Catholic churches, with the aim of advancing interreligious dialogue. Muslim religious groups are required to register with the Ministry of Justice and Islamic Affairs through the Sunni or Shiite awqaf (endowments) that oversee mosques and prayer houses; their directors are appointed by royal decree and paid by the government.

Although Shiite communities are free to carry out religious observances like Ashura, Shiite clerics and community leaders face harassment, interrogation, prosecution, and imprisonment. Shiite religious sites were demolished or vandalized in 2011 in apparent reprisal for the role of Shiite opposition groups in that year's protests. The Islamic Ulema Council, a group of Shiite clerics, was banned in 2014. Shiite cleric Isa Qassim lost his citizenship in 2016, received a suspended sentence for money laundering in 2017, and left Bahrain in 2018. Other Shiite clergy have been detained or questioned for their actual or suspected involvement in protest activity.

Academic freedom is not formally restricted, but scholars who criticize the government have in the past been subject to dismissal, and universities are affected by a broader climate in which criticism is frequently equated with disloyalty.

The penal code includes a variety of punishments for offenses such as insulting the king or state institutions and spreading false news. Many Bahrainis have been convicted and jailed for political speech, including on social media. Authorities have also warned against online expression that contradicts the foreign policy priorities of Bahrain and its regional allies. Following social media accounts deemed to promote sedition can constitute a cybercrime.

Security services are believed to employ networks of informers, and the government monitors the personal communications of activists, critics, and opposition members. Researchers with Toronto-based Citizen Lab have detected Pegasus spyware on the devices of at least a dozen Bahraini activists since 2020.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

A permit is required to hold demonstrations, and a variety of onerous restrictions make it difficult to organize a legal gathering in practice. Participants can face long jail terms, particularly if the demonstrations involve clashes with security personnel. Police regularly use force to break up political protests, most of which occur in Shiite villages.

In November 2022, during the visit by Pope Francis, a small protest was organized by families of prisoners on death row or facing life imprisonment; a spokesperson for the government confirmed that the protesters were asked to disperse and ultimately did so.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are prohibited from operating without a permit, and authorities have broad discretion to deny or revoke permits. The government also reserves the right to replace the boards of NGOs. Bahraini human rights defenders and their family members are subject to harassment, intimidation, and prosecution. Many remained either in prison or in exile as of 2022.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Bahrainis have the right to establish independent labor unions, but workers must give two weeks' notice before a strike, and strikes are banned in a variety of economic sectors. Trade unions cannot operate in the public sector, and collective-bargaining rights are limited even in the private sector. Harassment and firing of unionist workers occur in practice. Domestic, agricultural, and temporary workers do not have the right to join or form unions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The king appoints all judges and heads the Supreme Judicial Council, which administers the courts and proposes judicial nominees. The courts are subject to government pressure in practice. The country's judicial system is seen as corrupt and biased in favor of the ruling family and its allies, particularly in politically sensitive cases.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process is particularly problematic in politically sensitive cases. Law enforcement officers reportedly violate due process during arrests and detention, in part by obstructing detainees' access to attorneys. Detainees are sometimes held incommunicado. Judicial proceedings often put defendants at a disadvantage, with judges denying bail requests or restricting defense attorneys' attendance or arguments without explanation. Prominent defense lawyers who represent dissidents have themselves been prosecuted on various charges. A 2017 constitutional amendment permits military trials for civilians in security-related cases, further weakening due process rights.

In September 2022, a report from the Bahrain Centre for Human Rights found that there were 4,500 political activists currently in prison in Bahrain; it also concluded that Bahraini authorities had arrested some 15,000 people for their political views since 2011. A 2017 law allows prisoners to complete their sentences via alternative means, such as home detention and monitoring. Some political prisoners have been conditionally released under this provision.

Torture is criminalized, but detainees frequently report mistreatment by security forces and prison officials, who are rarely held accountable. The Interior Ministry ombudsman's office has failed to provide a meaningful check on such impunity. The Justice Ministry's Special Investigation Unit is also regarded as largely ineffective and lacking in independence, but it continued to examine cases of alleged ill-treatment and torture in 2022. In April, a criminal court sentenced three members of the security forces to three years in prison for physically assaulting two inmates.

Political prisoners have alleged denial of medical care and religious discrimination against Shiite inmates. Several reports of medical negligence emerged in 2022, particularly for political prisoners in Jau Prison, where there was apparently a tuberculosis outbreak. Among other prominent cases during the year, Amnesty International highlighted the conditions faced by human rights defenders Abdulhadi al-Khawaja, who was at risk of losing his vision due to lack of medical care, and Abduljalil al-Singace, who had been on hunger strike since 2021 and was being denied some of his medication. Both had been in prison since 2011.

A moratorium on executions ended in 2017, though no prisoners have been executed since 2019. UN special rapporteurs and experts have raised concerns that individuals sentenced to death were forced to confess under torture, among other flaws in their cases. Bangladeshi workers are heavily represented among this group; in 2021, the NGO Reprieve reported that eight of the 13 foreigners who received death sentences between 2011 and 2020 were Bangladeshi.

Police have sometimes been targeted in small bombings and armed attacks in recent years, though no major incidents were reported in 2022.

Women enjoy legal equality on some issues, and gender-based discrimination in employment is prohibited, but discrimination is common in practice.

Shiites of both Arab and Persian ethnicity face de facto discrimination in matters including employment. They are largely excluded from the security forces, except when serving as unarmed community police officers. The government does not publish socioeconomic data that are broken down by religious sect.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation is common. The law does not provide protections against such bias, though same-sex sexual activity is not criminalized for those aged 21 and older. Public displays of same-sex affection could fall afoul of public decency laws.

Bahrain is not a signatory to the 1951 refugee convention and does not recognize refugee status.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Authorities sometimes restrict movement inside the country to prevent protests by residents of largely Shiite villages outside Manama. The government also obstructs foreign travel by numerous opposition figures and activists.

Bahrain established a "flexible" permit for foreign workers in 2017, aiming to ease the workers' ability to change jobs; the traditional sponsorship (kafala) system ties migrant workers to a specific employer. However, participation in the newer scheme has been limited by numerical caps and other restrictions.

Although registered businesses are largely free to operate, obtaining approval can be difficult in practice. For the wealthy elites who dominate the business sector, property rights are generally respected, and expropriation is rare. Shiite citizens encounter difficulties obtaining affordable housing and in some cases face de facto bans on purchasing land. Much of the country's scarce land is occupied by royal properties and military facilities. Noncitizens can only own property in designated areas. Women may inherit property, but their rights are not equal to those of men.

Personal status issues such as marriage, divorce, and child custody are governed by a 2017 unified family law applying to both Sunni and Shiite Muslim families. The law's provisions are based on Sharia (Islamic law) principles that put women at a disadvantage on many topics. Unlike men, Bahraini women who marry non-Bahrainis cannot pass their citizenship to their children.

Accused rapists can avoid punishment by marrying their victims, and spousal rape is not specifically outlawed. Adultery is illegal, and those who kill a spouse caught in the act of adultery are eligible for lenience in sentencing.

Migrant workers, who make up a large portion of the population, are sometimes subjected to forced labor or have their salaries and passports withheld, although this is illegal. Due to their employment and living conditions, migrant workers have faced a disproportionate risk of contracting and dying from COVID-19, and those who lost their jobs amid the pandemic often faced eviction, denial of services, or deportation. Migrant workers also received fewer emergency benefits than citizens.

The US State Department found in its 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report that the government had made serious efforts to address human trafficking, highlighting the creation of a specialized prosecutor's office and court. The report also noted that no traffickers were convicted during its coverage period, however, and recommended increased efforts to investigate and convict traffickers.

Revenues from oil and gas exports are used to fund public employment and services that benefit all citizens, but access to public-sector jobs and promotion opportunities often depends on one's social and sectarian background and personal connections.

Bangladesh

Population: 171,200,000
Capital: Dhaka
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The ruling Awami League (AL) has consolidated political power through sustained harassment of the opposition and those perceived to be allied with it, as well as of critical media and voices in civil society. Corruption is endemic, and anticorruption efforts have been weakened by politicized enforcement. Due process guarantees are poorly upheld and security forces violate human rights with near impunity. Violence and discrimination against religious minorities and refugees, particularly Rohingya who have fled Myanmar, are significant problems.

- Bangladeshi security forces engaged in fewer extrajudicial killings during the year, after the US government sanctioned leaders of the elite Rapid Action Battalion (RAB). By February, human rights group Odhikar said that it recorded no such incidents, though security officers continued to engage in other abuses.
- The opposition Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP) was able to hold major rallies during the year, though AL supporters and authorities continued to disrupt rallies and clash with participants. At least 1 person died and another 60 were injured when police fired on BNP supporters during a December rally in Dhaka; two BNP leaders were then taken into custody for questioning.
- In June, the government revoked the registration of human rights group Odhikar, which documented human rights abuses in Bangladesh. The decision was upheld in September.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 15 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 4 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

A largely ceremonial president, who serves for five years, is elected by the legislature. President Abdul Hamid was elected to his second term unopposed in 2018.

The leader of the party that wins the most seats in the unicameral National Parliament assumes the position of prime minister and wields effective power. Sheikh Hasina Wazed began her third term as prime minister in early 2019 following the AL's overwhelming victory in the 2018 elections, which were delegitimized by violence, credible allegations of fraud, and the exclusion of nonpartisan election monitors.

The National Parliament is composed of 350 members, 300 of whom are directly elected. Political parties select a total of 50 women members based on the parties' share of elected seats.

In the December 2018 parliamentary election, the Grand Alliance, which is led by the AL, won 288 directly elected seats. The BNP-led National Unity Front won 8. Election day and the preceding campaign were marked by political violence, ballot stuffing, and harassment and arrest of government critics and opposition candidates and supporters. After the polls, the BNP alleged that law enforcement and the army were complicit in electoral fraud. Several domestic and international observation missions were unable to observe the elections due to delayed or denied accreditation.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

Opposition parties and outside observers have long criticized the independence of the Election Commission (EC) and its ability to investigate complaints. Some foreign governments and international organizations have withdrawn financial assistance to the EC over such concerns. The EC's stewardship of recent elections lent further credence to complaints that it favors the AL, as it disproportionately disqualified opposition candidates during the 2018 electoral period. Local elections held in 2022 were also marred by allegations of fraud.

New EC members were sworn in in late February 2022 to prepare for the next national election, which is set for January 2024. The BNP and most other opposition groups did not participate in the selection process, while the BNP named no candidates to serve on the EC. The BNP heavily criticized a draft law on the new EC in January, citing the body's perceived alignment with the AL.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

Bangladesh has a multiparty system in which power has historically alternated between AL- and BNP-led coalitions; third parties have traditionally had difficulty achieving traction. Both parties are led by family dynasties and have little internal democracy. A crackdown on the BNP ahead of the 2018 elections significantly disrupted its operations. Since 2018, the government has eased restrictions on opposition protests and rallies, though opposition activities are still met with some repression. In 2022, the BNP was able to organize large protests, though authorities and AL supporters disrupted some of those events.

The Islamist political party Jamaat-e-Islami (JI), which supported a BNP-led government from 2001 to 2006, lost its registration in 2013 for violating constitutional provisions outlawing religiously based parties. JI candidates have since run as independents or part of the BNP. JI came under continued pressure in 2022; in August, the EC announced it would not allow JI to pursue election activities under a new name. In December, the BNP founded a new electoral alliance in a move that analysts perceived an effort to distance it from JI. JI leaders have been prosecuted by the International Crimes Tribunal, a domestic government body that investigates war crimes committed during Bangladesh's independence war.

The BNP has been weakened by regular harassment and arrests of key members that have significantly harmed its ability to challenge the AL in elections; the BNP has also boycotted national and local elections in recent years. The 2018 election campaign, in which the BNP did take part, was marred by a crackdown that saw thousands of people and several political candidates arrested and many physically assaulted. BNP leader Khaleda Zia was imprisoned in 2018 and remains under de facto house arrest over corruption convictions. In December 2022, seven BNP lawmakers resigned at an antigovernment rally.

Nevertheless, political conditions have marginally improved recently. Independent candidates and defectors defeated AL candidates in the 2021–22 local election cycle and the BNP was permitted to hold major protests in 2022.

The AL and BNP dominate politics and limit political choices for those who question internal party structures or hierarchy, or who would create alternative parties or political groupings.

Animosity between Hasina and Zia, as well as between lower-level cadres, has contributed to continued political and electoral violence in which thousands of people have been killed or injured.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

In the National Parliament, 50 seats are allotted to women, who are elected by political parties based on their overall share of elected seats. Women lead both main political parties. Nevertheless, societal discrimination limits female participation in politics in practice. Men are likelier to be selected as candidates, while women are often relegated to serving in women's wings of their parties; women also face social pressure to refrain from political activity. Religious, ethnic, and other marginalized groups remain underrepresented in politics and state agencies.

LGBT+ people are also limited in their ability to participate in politics, though they have won office. The town of Trilochanpur elected a member of the hijra community—whose members identify as neither male nor female and are classified as a distinct gender identity in Bangladesh—mayor in late 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

Policy is set by the ruling AL, and weaknesses in the country's institutions have reduced checks on its processes and decision-making. The dearth of opposition representation in the National Parliament significantly reduces its ability to scrutinize government policies, budgets, and proposed legislation. The incumbent government's legitimacy was also undermined by the conduct of the 2018 election, which was marred by violence, intimidation, and allegations of fraud.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is widespread. Under the AL, anticorruption efforts have been weakened by politicized enforcement and subversion of the judicial process. The Anti-Corruption Commission is ineffective and subject to overt political interference. The government continues to bring or pursue politicized corruption cases against BNP leaders. Throughout the COVID-19 pandemic, AL politicians and government officials were accused of corruption during relief efforts.

Media outlets and civil society face restrictions and are less able to expose government corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Endemic corruption and criminality, weak rule of law, limited bureaucratic transparency, and political polarization have long undermined government accountability. The 2009 Right to Information Act (RIA) mandates public access to all information held by public bodies and overrides secrecy legislation. Although it has been unevenly implemented, journalists and civil society activists have had some success in using it to obtain information from local governing authorities.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 25 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Journalists and media outlets face many forms of pressure, including frequent lawsuits, harassment, and serious or deadly physical attacks. Throughout 2022, journalists were arrested or physically assaulted for critical reporting on the government, which has escalated under the AL government. A climate of impunity for attacks on media workers remains the norm, and there has been little progress made to ensure justice for a series of blogger murders since 2015. Dozens of bloggers remain in hiding or exile.

The 2018 Digital Security Act (DSA) allows the government to conduct searches or arrest individuals without a warrant, criminalizes various forms of online speech, and was vehemently opposed by journalists. Forms of artistic expression contained in books, films, and other materials are occasionally banned or censored.

Islam is designated as the official religion, though the constitution designates secularism as a fundamental principle. Although religious minorities have the right to worship freely, they occasionally face legal repercussions for proselytizing or alleged blasphemy. Members of minority groups—including Hindus, Christians, Buddhists, and Shiite and Ahmadiyya Muslims—face harassment and violence, including occasional mob violence against their houses of worship. Violence against religious minorities can be deliberately provoked on social media. In July 2022, for example, Hindu-owned homes and businesses were vandalized along with a temple in the village of Sahapara in apparent response to a Facebook post that denigrated Islam.

Those with secular or nonconformist views can face societal opprobrium and attacks from hardline Islamist groups.

In recent years, Bangladesh's academic institutions have faced frequent threats from a variety of actors, resulting in reduced autonomy and rising self-censorship. Faculty hiring and promotion are often linked to support for the AL, and campus debate is often stifled by the Bangladesh Chhatra League (BCL), the party's student wing; the BCL acts with impunity despite being known to law enforcement. In 2022, the BCL continued to suppress dissent and attack government critics on campus.

Islamist groups have growing influence on government policy and standards, compelling changes to educational content they deemed "atheistic" in widely used Bengali-language textbooks. Separately, Islamic extremists have attacked secular professors.

Open discussion of sensitive religious and political issues is restrained by fears of harassment and violence from the government and religious fundamentalists. Religious fundamentalists have retaliated against those who publicly discuss LGBT+ rights, atheism, or criticism of Islamist movements.

Bangladeshis are fearful of expressing dissent. A 2019 poll from the International Republican Institute indicated that a considerable number of Bangladeshis are afraid to publicly express their political opinions and widely reported self-censorship. The DSA has enabled the government to increase censorship of digital content and surveillance of telecommunications and social media; nearly 1,000 individuals were arrested under the DSA for mostly politicized and minor offenses between late 2018 and mid-2021 according to Amnesty International.

The government published the draft Data Protection Act, 2022, in July; Amnesty International had criticized its proposed framework in April, warning that it would give authorities access to encrypted communications and effectively override the RIA.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution provides for the rights of assembly and association, but this is upheld inconsistently. Protesters are frequently injured and occasionally killed during clashes in which police use excessive force.

While space for protests expanded in 2022, AL supporters and authorities targeted opposition rallies. In September, the European Union delegation to Bangladesh voiced concerns over clashes between BNP supporters and police that began in late August, some of which were fatal. In December, at least 1 person died and 60 were injured after police fired on BNP demonstrators at a Dhaka rally. Authorities then took two BNP leaders into custody for questioning, accusing them of provoking the violence.

Many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate without onerous restrictions, but the use of foreign funds is closely monitored, and the government has broad authority to deregister NGOs. Democracy, governance, and human rights NGOs are regularly denied permission for proposed projects and face harassment and surveillance. Pressure and intimidation from Islamist groups also limit NGO activities on some issues such as LGBT+ rights and protection for religious minorities.

In April 2022, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that Bangladeshi authorities were retaliating against human rights advocates, their relatives, and the survivors of victims mistreated or killed by the RAB, which the US government sanctioned in 2021. In June 2022, the government revoked the registration of human rights NGO Odhikar, which documented human rights abuses in Bangladesh; the decision was upheld in September.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Legal reforms in 2015 eased restrictions on the formation of unions. However, union leaders who attempt to organize or unionize workers continue to face dismissal or physical intimidation. Labor rights organizations also face harassment. Worker grievances fuel unrest at factories, particularly in the garment industry, where protests over wages and working conditions are common. Protesting workers often face violence, arrest, and dismissal.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16 (+1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Politicization of and pressure against the judiciary persists. The Ministry of Law controls promotions, postings, and transfers of subordinate court judges. Judges face political pressure over their rulings and judicial appointments at all levels are highly politicized.

In 2017, Supreme Court chief justice Surendra Kumar Sinha retired and fled Bangladesh, saying he was threatened over rulings against the government. In late 2021, he was sentenced in absentia to 11 years' imprisonment on corruption charges his supporters called politically motivated.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Individuals' ability to access the justice system is compromised by endemic corruption within the courts and severe case backlogs. Pretrial detention is often lengthy, and many defendants lack counsel. Suspects are routinely subject to arbitrary arrest and detention, demands for bribes, and physical abuse by police. Criminal cases against AL activists are regularly withdrawn on the grounds of "political consideration," undermining the judicial process and entrenching a culture of impunity.

The 1974 Special Powers Act permits arbitrary detention without charge, and the criminal procedure code allows detention without a warrant. A 2009 counterterrorism law includes a broad definition of terrorism and generally does not meet international standards. Concerns have repeatedly been raised that the International Crimes Tribunal's procedures and verdicts do not meet international standards on issues such as victim and witness protection, the presumption of innocence, defendant access to counsel, and the right to bail. The tribunal has regularly imposed death sentences in recent years.

Security forces have faced persistent accusations of extrajudicial killings, abductions and other human rights abuses, including during operations to counter the drug trade, organized crime, and terrorism. In late 2021, the US government placed sanctions on several leaders of the RAB. These sanctions appeared to curtail extrajudicial killings in 2022. Nevertheless, security agencies continue to commit human rights abuses including enforced disappearances, the use of secret prisons, arbitrary arrests, and torture.

While terrorist activity from Islamic militants has remained low since the 2016 Holey Artisan Bakery attack, there is ongoing concern that the Taliban's 2021 overthrow of Afghanistan's elected government could inspire militant activity in Bangladesh.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because there were fewer incidents in which security forces used violence against civilians.

Members of ethnic and religious minority communities and other historically marginalized groups face some legal discrimination, as well as harassment and violations of their rights in practice.

Over a million ethnic Rohingyas fleeing Myanmar have entered Bangladesh since the 1990s, with a recent influx occurring in 2017. The vast majority do not have official refugee status and have limited access to health care, employment, and education. Repatriation efforts have failed, and the Bangladeshi government has implemented punitive policies in the camps including periodically disrupting mobile service and erecting barbed wire fencing. The government began to shut unsanctioned schools in late 2021.

In 2020, authorities began transferring refugees to the flood-prone island of Bhasan Char, which has a refugee population of 30,000 as of August 2022. The government plans to resettle at least 100,000 there. Refugee camps on the mainland are affected by gang-related violence and other forms of lawlessness. In October, two Rohingya community leaders were murdered in a refugee camp; authorities blamed the Arakan Rohingya Salvation Army, a Myanmar insurgent group. Refugees continue to flee Bangladesh on dangerous sea routes; the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees reported that 2,400 attempted to flee by sea in 2022, five times as many as in 2021.

A criminal ban on same-sex relations is rarely enforced, but societal discrimination remains the norm, and LGBT+ individuals are regularly attacked. A number of LGBT+ individuals remain in exile after Islamist militants murdered LGBT+ activist Xulhaz Mannan in 2016. Some legal recognition is available for transgender people, though they face severe discrimination in practice.

Women face social discrimination. Despite rising participation in the labor market, women still constitute less than 50 percent of the labor force. Women suffer sexual harassment and other forms of abuse in the workplace.

Indigenous people in the Chittagong Hill Tracts (CHT), religious and linguistic minorities, and other ethnic groups remain subject to physical attacks, property destruction, land grabs by Bengali settlers, occasional abuses by security forces, and social discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The ability to move within the country is relatively unrestricted, as is foreign travel, though there are some rules on travel into and around the CHT districts by foreigners as well as into Rohingya refugee camps.

There are few legal restrictions regarding choice of education or employment.

Property rights are unevenly enforced, and the ability to engage freely in private economic activity is somewhat constrained. Corruption and bribery, inadequate infrastructure, and official bureaucratic and regulatory hurdles hinder business activities throughout the country. State involvement and interference in the economy is considerable. The 2011 Vested Properties Return Act allows Hindus to reclaim land that the government or other individuals seized, but it has been unevenly implemented. Tribal minorities have little control over land decisions affecting them, and Bengali-speaking settlers continue to illegally encroach on tribal lands in the CHT.

Under personal status laws affecting all religions, women have fewer marriage, divorce, and inheritance rights than men, and face discrimination in social services and employment. Rape, acid throwing, and other forms of gender-based violence occur regularly despite laws offering some level of protection. As many as 70 percent of married women are abused by their intimate partners but rarely report those incidents. Domestic violence survivors receive little assistance from government-run shelters or support programs. In 2020, the government introduced the death penalty for rape in response to large protests after a series of high-profile incidents of rape and sexual assault.

Giving or receiving dowry is a criminal offense, but coercive requests still occur. Bangladesh has one of the world's highest rates of child marriage. Despite a stated government commitment in 2014 to abolish the practice by 2041, parliamentarians approved a law that would permit girls under the age of 18 to marry under certain circumstances in 2017, reversing a previous legal ban on the practice.

Socioeconomic inequality is widespread. Working conditions in the garment industry remain extremely unsafe in most factories despite the renewal of a legally binding accord between unions and clothing brands to improve safety practices. Comprehensive reforms of the industry are hampered by the fact that a growing number of factory owners are also legislators or influential businesspeople.

Bangladesh remains both a major supplier of and transit point for trafficking victims. Women and children are trafficked both overseas and within the country for the purposes of domestic servitude and sexual exploitation, while men are trafficked primarily for labor abroad. In the 2022 edition of its Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department noted that antitrafficking tribunals resumed operating in 2021 but said that the government had lowered its protection efforts during the reporting period. A comprehensive 2013 antitrafficking law provides protection to victims and increased penalties for traffickers, but enforcement remains inadequate.

Barbados

Population: 300,000
Capital: Bridgetown
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Barbados is a democracy that regularly holds competitive elections and upholds civil liberties. Challenges include a lack of government transparency, discrimination against LGBT+ people, violent crime, and poverty.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In a snap election in January, the Barbados Labour Party (BLP) of Prime Minister Mia Mottley won another term, securing every seat in the lower house. Turnout fell to a record low of 41.7 percent.
- A Constitutional Reform Commission (CRC) started work in June. The CRC has a mandate to develop a new constitution to "meet the circumstances of a 21st century Barbados."
- In December, the High Court struck down sections of the 1992 Sexual Offences Act that criminalized same-sex relations. A written ruling was to be released in January 2023.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40 (−1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, usually the leader of the largest party in Parliament, heads the government. Mia Mottley of the BLP became prime minister after that party won the 2018 polls, defeating a Democratic Labour Party (DLP) government. Mottley remained in office after the BLP won snap elections in January 2022.

The British monarch was the head of state and was represented by a governor general until 2021, when Barbados became a republic. Former governor general Sandra Mason began serving a four-year term as president after being appointed by the prime minister and voted into the office by Parliament that year.

Members of the 30-seat House of Assembly, the lower house, are directly elected for five-year terms. The upper house, the Senate, comprises 21 members appointed by the president: 12 are chosen by the prime minister, 2 are nominated on the advice of the opposition, and 7 are chosen by the president. Senators serve five-year terms.

The BLP won 69 percent of the vote and all 30 lower-house seats in the snap January 2022 elections. The DLP won 27 percent of the vote. While the polls were credible, turnout stood at a record low at 41.7 percent. Some Barbadians were unable to cast ballots because they were in COVID-19 quarantine. A lawsuit over the issue was not allowed to proceed in mid-January for technical reasons. After the elections, Prime Minister Mottley said she would reach out to opposition parties to discuss senatorial appointments.

The independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission oversees elections in Barbados in a professional manner. Its five commissioners are chosen based on expertise by the prime minister and the opposition for a term of five years.

In January 2022, Prime Minister Mottley called for a constitutional amendment to allow an 18-year-old nominee to enter the Senate. The government decided not to pursue the matter further in March because it lacked sufficient support for such an amendment.

The CRC, which is comprised of legal experts and civil society leaders selected by the attorney general, started work in June 2022 with a broad mandate to develop a constitution, including via public consultation, to be approved by Parliament. The CRC's formation is widely seen as long overdue, but the CRC has been criticized as opposition members and some minority groups are not represented on it.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16 (−1)

The BLP dominates politics and holds all seats in the lower house, though other political parties do exist. The DLP was until recently a major political force but, along with several smaller opposition parties, failed to win any seats in either the 2018 or 2022 elections. Barbados has been without a leader of the opposition since January 2022, as no opposition party won seats in that month's polls.

Power has historically rotated peacefully between the BLP and DLP. However, the BLP won major electoral victories in 2018 and January 2022.

The DLP, meanwhile, won no seats in either election. Since 2018, neither the DLP nor any other opposition party has received the annual subvention generally paid to such groups. In November 2022, the DLP called on the Mottley administration to account for the subvention funds and warned that the lack of opposition funding was impacting Barbadian party politics; the party also questioned whether the ruling BLP had received subvention funds instead.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because opposition groups have not received mandated state funding since losing parliamentary seats in the last election, hindering their ability to compete.

Voters and candidates are generally able to express their political choices without interference from actors that are not democratically accountable.

Barbados's population is fully enfranchised, with adult citizens, Commonwealth citizens, and foreigners with seven years' residency able to vote. Laws protect the political rights of women, but societal marginalization can discourage women from running for office. While the BLP and DLP leaders who contested the January 2022 elections were female, women make up only 26.7 percent of the House of Assembly—though that figure is the highest seen in the country's history.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

The prime minister and Parliament are largely unimpeded in their ability to craft and implement policy. In 2021, Barbados became a republic.

Barbados's first-past-the-post electoral system meant that a 69-percent vote for the BLP in January 2022 translated to a 100-percent share of the lower house. There is no constitutional mechanism to select a leader of the opposition in such cases, which weakens scrutiny of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Acts of corruption occur but with less frequency than in the rest of the region. Barbados's government has failed to prosecute senior officials. Potential whistleblowers fear costly defamation suits. A Prevention of Corruption Act was passed in 2021, updating legislation dating back to 1929.

Barbados is one of just seven countries in the Americas to have neither signed nor ratified the Inter-American Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters. The government has signed but not ratified the UN Convention against Corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

A Freedom of Information Act is yet to materialize. In February 2022, the Mottley administration vowed to reintroduce its Integrity in Public Life Bill, which the Senate rejected in 2020. That bill was not laid before Parliament by year's end, however.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The media are free from censorship and government control. Newspapers, including the two major dailies, are privately owned. Four private and two government-run radio stations operate. The government-owned Caribbean Broadcasting Corporation is the main local television station and is broadly balanced.

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, which is widely respected for mainstream religious groups. Greater protections for the Rastafarian and Muslim communities have been secured in recent years.

Blasphemy is banned in Barbados, but that restriction is reportedly not enforced.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected, though members of the government occasionally disparage academics who criticize government policy.

Freedom of speech is largely respected in Barbados, with commentators and members of the public free to express their views on most topics without encountering negative consequences.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Barbados's legal framework guarantees freedom of assembly, which is upheld in practice. Several protests took place peacefully in 2022, including a demonstration in February to demand the reopening of schools after COVID-19-related lockdowns.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Many nongovernmental organizations operate without restriction or surveillance in Barbados, primarily focusing on cultural issues, homelessness, environmentalism, and women's rights.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The right to form labor unions is respected, and unions are active and influential. However, critics have alleged that the BLP is seeking to sideline or co-opt organized labor bodies. Unions have argued that the Employment Rights Tribunal is weak; in September 2022, the government vowed to address the issue.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary generally operates with independence. The Supreme Court includes a high court and a court of appeals. The Caribbean Court of Justice (CCJ) is the highest appellate court for Barbados. The prime minister enjoys a wide degree of discretion in judicial appointments and removals, something Mottley has promised to address in an ongoing constitutional reform process.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Constitutional due process guarantees are generally upheld. While the Mottley administration has appointed new judges, a case backlog persists.

Barbados is free from war. However, complaints that the Barbados Police Force physically abuses suspects have been reported in recent years.

Amid worsening gang violence, 43 homicides were reported in 2022, up from 32 in 2021.

The government has taken some steps to address prison overcrowding and abuse. In 2019, the government repealed the mandatory death penalty in cases of murder; the CCJ had ruled that practice unconstitutional in 2018. Capital punishment remains on the statute book, though the last execution was in 1984 and the last sentence in 2016. However, a number of prisoners facing the death sentence still awaited resentencing in 2022.

Women make up half of the country's workforce, although they earn less than men for comparable work. LGBT+ people face discrimination in housing, employment, and health care.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals in Barbados are generally free to move, live, and work as they see fit.

The legal framework generally supports property rights and private business activity. The government has worked to ensure a healthy environment for business and to attract domestic and foreign investment, particularly in the tourism industry.

Violence against women remains widespread, and laws addressing domestic violence are not well enforced.

Same-sex relations were illegal under the 1992 Sexual Offences Act, but the High Court decriminalized those relations by striking part of that law down in December 2022. A written ruling was to be released in January 2023.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

Residents generally have access to economic opportunity, and the law provides some protections against exploitative labor practices. However, unions have criticized opaque employment practices in the hospitality industry.

The government continues to crack down on human trafficking; in the 2022 edition of its Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department reported that authorities launched the first trafficking-related prosecutions since 2013. However, no successful convictions have been recorded since the 2016 Trafficking in Persons Prevention Act came into force.

Belarus

Population: 9,200,000
Capital: Minsk
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Belarus is an authoritarian state in which elections are openly rigged and civil liberties are severely restricted. In 2020, Alyaksandr Lukashenka, who maintains a firm grip over the military and security forces, cracked down on a massive prodemocracy protest movement that was sparked by his reelection in a fraudulent presidential poll. Since then, security forces have violently assaulted and arbitrarily detained journalists and ordinary citizens who challenge the regime. The judiciary and other institutions lack independence and provide no check on Lukashenka's power.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In February, several constitutional amendments were adopted via a referendum that was neither free nor fair. The approved amendments included provisions granting President Lukashenka lifelong immunity from prosecution.
- Belarus served as a staging ground for Russian military forces before they invaded Ukraine in February, and Lukashenka continued to allow Russian troops to operate on Belarusian territory through year's end. During the year, the government deliberately obscured information about the scale and extent of Belarus's involvement in the war against Ukraine.
- Authorities violently cracked down on antiwar demonstrations during the year, arresting more than 800 protesters in February alone. Security forces were also excessive when responding to people accused of disrupting railway links and supply lines used by the Russian military; authorities additionally harassed and threatened relatives of Belarusian volunteers in the Ukrainian military.
- The government approved several legislative measures targeting political activists living in exile during the year. In July, Lukashenka enacted legislation permitting authorities to hold trials in absentia for those accused of threatening Belarus's national security; in December, the parliament approved a legislative amendment that allows the citizenship of both native-born and naturalized Belarusians residing abroad to be revoked if they are convicted of charges related to "extremism."

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

The president is elected for five-year terms. A two-term limit, reintroduced by the 2022 amendments to the constitution, will be imposed after the next presidential election. Alyaksandr Lukashenka was first elected president in 1994, in the country's only democratic election. The 2020 campaign period was heavily controlled by authorities, who permitted only 15 of 55 applicants to register as candidates. The government arrested two major candidates, Siarhei Tsikhanouski and Viktar Babaryka, and forced another, Valery Tsepkalo, to flee Belarus before voting day. Scores of activists were similarly arrested or fled. Sviatlana Tsikhanouskaya registered as a presidential candidate after her husband, Siarhei, was arrested. She received the endorsements of Maryia Kalesnikava and Veronika Tsepkalo, respectively representing the Babaryka and Tsepkalo campaigns. The three women, who led the largest opposition rallies in the country since the fall of the Soviet Union, experienced severe pressure from the authorities, and both Tsikhanouskaya and Veronika Tsepkalo went into exile after the election.

Authorities failed to send a timely invitation to the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), and the elections took place without an independent monitoring mission. The government's claim that Lukashenka won 80 percent of the vote was widely denounced as fraudulent. A parallel and independent vote count using the mobile phone application Golos, with data from nearly 23 percent of polling stations, revealed that Tsikhanouskaya likely received 13 times more votes than were reported. Protests after the announcement of the results were met with disproportionate force, including the use of live ammunition and mass, arbitrary detentions, among other abuses. By the end of 2020, 33,000 people had been detained and fined.

In September 2020, amid ongoing massive protests and growing calls for a repeat election, Lukashenka inaugurated himself in a secret, unannounced ceremony.

Legislative elections in Belarus are tightly restricted. The 110 members of the Chamber of Representatives, the lower house of the National Assembly, are elected by popular vote to four-year terms from single-mandate constituencies. The upper chamber, the Council of the Republic, consists of 64 members serving four-year terms; regional councils elect 56 and the president appoints 8.

A parliamentary election was held in November 2019, nearly a year ahead of schedule. Candidates loyal to Lukashenka won every seat in the lower house, while independent candidates won none. OSCE election monitors reported an overall lack of transparency, restrictions on observation of the vote count, and indications of ballot box stuffing.

The legal framework for elections fails to meet democratic standards, and authorities have dismissed OSCE recommendations to improve it. Electoral commission members of all levels are politically aligned with and dependent on the government; out of the 1,989 members of local electoral commissions formed for the 2020 presidential election, only two representatives of independent political parties were allowed to register. Independent observers have no access to ballot-counting processes.

A national referendum on constitutional amendments that will further cement Lukashenka's grip on power was held in February 2022. According to the Central Election Commission (CEC), the amendments passed with the support of 65 percent of voters. The voting process was characterized by numerous flaws, including the exclusion of independent observers. Opposition members were not permitted to campaign, while citizens residing abroad were not allowed to vote. Antigovernment demonstrations on election day resulted in the detention of more than 800 people, many of whom were protesting both the referendum and the war in Ukraine.

The constitutional amendments reintroduced a two-term limit for presidents, which will take effect once a newly elected president assumes office and do not apply to Lukashenka's current term. Lukashenka would thus be able to be reelected as president until 2035. Among other changes, the amendments also introduced a new governing body, the All-Belarus

People's Assembly, which has extensive executive powers. The amended constitution does not specify the election procedure for assembly members.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

Involvement in political activism can result in a loss of employment, expulsion from educational institutions, smear campaigns in the media, fines, the confiscation of property, and imprisonment. Political parties face formidable challenges when seeking official registration. Political initiatives are actively persecuted and can lead to criminal charges for their leaders. Authorities harass and threaten political opponents, public figures, and political dissidents through state media.

Prominent political opponents to Lukashenka's regime face politically motivated criminal charges and lengthy prison sentences. In 2021, Viktar Babaryka was sentenced to 14 years in prison and Siarhei Tsikhanouski to 18 years. Numerous activists and opposition members received lengthy prison terms in 2022, including Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL) journalist Andrey Kuznechyk.

In August 2020, Maryia Kalesnikava, who campaigned with Tsikhanouskaya and Babaryka, announced the creation of a new political party called "Together." That September, Kalesnikava was kidnapped and later incarcerated, effectively ending the initiative. That same month, Tsikhanouskaya and other activists formed the Coordination Council, a civil society group that sought a peaceful resolution to the postelection violence and a rerun of the presidential poll. Belarusian authorities arrested and prosecuted several of its leaders, claiming that they were attempting to seize power illegally and that they were a national security threat. Coordination Council founding members Maryia Kalesnikava and Maxim Znak were sentenced in September 2021 to 11 years and 10 years in prison, respectively, on dubious charges including conspiracy to seize power. In December 2022, the general prosecutor announced that exiled members of the Coordination Council, including Tsikhanouskaya, would be tried in absentia on numerous charges; Tsikhanouskaya specifically faces a charge of treason.

There is effectively no opportunity for independent candidates to gain power through elections, and Belarus has never experienced a democratic transfer of power. During the 2020 presidential election, vast numbers of Belarusians responded enthusiastically to the participation of opposition candidates. This interest manifested itself at the early stages of campaign and, despite the regime's attempts to eliminate challengers, developed into a broad civil resistance movement. However, Lukashenka's regime has proven unyielding to the popular demand for political change.

Private citizens and political candidates are limited in their opportunities to express their views and make political choices. Meaningful participation in politics is generally not possible. The police and military used severe, sometimes fatal, violence and arrested and detained over 33,000 people to crack down on the August–November 2020 prodemocracy protests, ensuring that Lukashenka would remain in power. Antigovernment demonstrations during the February 2022 constitutional referendum were also repressed by authorities, who arrested more than 800 people, preventing many from voting; at year's end, approximately 1,450 people were being held as political prisoners.

No registered party represents the specific interests of ethnic, religious, or other minority groups. In recent years, Belarusian authorities have dissolved nonprofit advocacy groups, charity organizations, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that represented the interests of minority groups, including LGBT+ people and people living with disabilities.

Women formally enjoy equal political rights and make up 40 percent of the legislators elected in November 2019. However, women are underrepresented in leadership positions. Independent civil society's initiatives on raising awareness of gender-based violence and discrimination have been unsuccessful. State-sponsored women's advocacy groups and the government refrain from addressing these issues.

Authorities restrict the use of the Belarusian language in official settings, and Belarusian-language ballots were not available during the 2022 national referendum.

Throughout 2022, the government implemented various measures designed to target political opponents, civil society activists, and journalists in exile and exclude them from the domestic political process. For example, Belarusians living abroad were not permitted to vote in the February constitutional referendum. In December, the government adopted a legislative amendment allowing the authorities to revoke the citizenship of both native-born and naturalized Belarusians abroad if they are convicted of charges related to "extremism"; the law had not entered into force before year's end.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

Though Lukashenka claimed victory in the 2020 presidential elections, the legitimacy of his office is disputed both domestically and internationally. The constitution vests power in the president, stating that presidential decrees supersede legislation. Lukashenka considers himself the head of all branches of government, including the parliament, which always supports his policies and rarely initiates legislation on its own. Observers say that constitutional amendments enacted in February 2022 further entrenched Lukashenka's power, including by guaranteeing that after leaving office, former presidents will be granted immunity from prosecution for their actions while president and given a permanent seat in the Council of the Republic.

The state controls at least 70 percent of the economy, and graft is encouraged by a lack of transparency and accountability in government. There are no independent bodies to investigate corruption cases, and graft trials are typically closed. Presidential clemency has been issued occasionally to free convicted corrupt officials, some of whom Lukashenka has returned to positions of authority.

Powerful oligarchs enjoy the protection of the government and adjustment of regulations and government policies in their favor, so long as they channel money to Lukashenka in a quid pro quo arrangement. Spurious bribery and tax evasion charges have been used against Lukashenka's political opponents and human rights activists; for example, in 2021, Viktar Babaryka was sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment on corruption charges after he announced his intentions to register as a presidential candidate.

The government largely fails to adhere to legal access-to-information requirements, though authorities have moved to make some basic information about government operations available online in recent years.

From August through November 2021, Lukashenka intentionally withheld information about the increased numbers of economic migrants and asylum seekers that were being allowed into the country. Journalists and human rights groups have regularly been prevented from accessing migrant camps in Belarus near the Polish border.

Additionally, during 2022, the government deliberately obscured information about Belarusian involvement in the Russian invasion of Ukraine, including the stationing of Russian troops in Belarus.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 6 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 1 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The government exercises unrestricted control over mainstream media. The 2008 media law secures a state monopoly over information about political, social, and economic affairs. Libel is both a civil and criminal offense, and the criminal code contains provisions protecting the "honor and dignity" of high-ranking officials.

The government owns the only internet service provider and controls the internet through legal and technical means. From August 9 to 12, 2020, during the height of the mass prodemocracy protests, the government disrupted internet access in almost the entire country, limiting reporters' ability to provide accurate information to the public. Internet disruptions were registered during protest rallies throughout 2020.

The official definition of mass media includes websites and blogs, placing them under the Information Ministry's supervision. Most independent journalists operate under the assumption that the Committee for State Security (KGB) surveils them. Reporters are subject to fines, detention, intimidation, and criminal prosecution for their work. The regime has used antiextremism legislation and investigations into alleged financial crimes to curtail media activity. In 2021, the government amended legislation on "mass media," "mass events," and "criminal liability," all of which tightened restrictions for independent media and significantly increased the already disproportionate criminal penalties for legitimate journalistic activities.

The government has forcefully cracked down on independent media in recent years. In 2021 and 2022, security forces raided the offices and homes of independent journalists, arrested journalists and staff members of news outlets, and seized equipment. At least 40 journalists were detained in 2022. Several journalists were given lengthy prison sentences in 2022, including Ksenia Lutskina, who was detained in 2020 following the prodemocracy protests and sentenced to eight years' imprisonment on charges of "conspiring to seize state power" in September 2022.

Authorities blocked access to over 100 news and media sites, including the country's most popular internet portal, Tut.by, in 2021. In March 2022, the government blocked access to several Ukrainian media sites, labeling them "extremist."

Despite constitutional guarantees of religious equality, government decrees and registration requirements restrict religious activity. Legal amendments in 2002 provided for government censorship of religious publications and barred foreigners from leading religious groups.

The amendments also placed strict limitations on religious groups active in Belarus for less than 20 years. In 2003, the government signed a concordat with the Belarusian Orthodox Church, which is controlled by the Russian Orthodox Church, giving it a privileged position.

After the 2020 elections, Lukashenka attempted to weaken the influence of the Catholic Church, which had denounced state violence against peaceful prodemocracy protesters. Several Catholic priests faced administrative detentions and fines, and some were forced to leave the country. Tadeusz Kondrusiewicz, a Belarusian citizen and archbishop of Minsk-Mahileu, was denied reentry to the country in August 2020. Though he was allowed to return to Belarus that December, he resigned in January 2021.

Political pressure on the Catholic Church continued throughout 2022. In August, the government closed a Catholic school in Minsk and in October, terminated a decades-long agreement that had allowed the Catholic Church to occupy and use the Church of Saints Simon and Helena in Minsk.

Academic freedom remains subject to intense state ideological pressures, and academic personnel face harassment and dismissal if they use a liberal curriculum or are suspected of disloyalty. Students and professors who join opposition protests or express political dissent face threat of dismissal and revocation of degrees. In recent years, the government has increasingly restricted Belarusian-language instruction in schools and universities.

The government pressures young people to join the state-sponsored, pro-Lukashenka Belarusian Republican Union of Youth (BRSM). The government has tightened control over private schools and kindergartens, which has resulted in the closure of many alternative educational centers.

Many students were involved in the August 2020 prodemocracy protests. Authorities responded with unprovoked brutality and repression, as plainclothes security forces attacked peaceful student protests within and outside of university campuses. Lukashenka replaced at least eight deans at different universities. Between August 2020 and May 2021, at least 153 university students were arbitrarily expelled, many of whom fled to neighboring countries. Throughout 2021 and 2022, student activists were arrested and given yearslong prison sentences on a variety of spurious charges, including allegedly "violating social order."

In January 2022, President Lukashenka ordered historians to devise a single, unified "correct interpretation of history" to be taught in Belarus, and enacted legislation criminalizing any deviation from the approved historical narrative. Constitutional amendments adopted in February state that the government must "ensure the preservation of historical truth" of Belarusian heroism during World War II, further reinforcing Lukashenka's narrative. The new official history was introduced in Belarusian schools in September.

The use of wiretapping and other surveillance by state security agencies limits the right to free private discussion. Private citizens often avoid discussing sensitive issues over the phone or via the internet, for fear that state security agents are monitoring conversations.

Authorities routinely threaten, harass, and arrest people who speak out against Lukashenka, postelection violence, and the war in Ukraine.

Police often coerce, threaten, and torture detained individuals, forcing them to open their mobile devices in search of evidence of antigovernment sentiment. Security forces also organize raids of private homes, detain people in workplaces, and conduct random searches and interrogations to silence dissent. Authorities actively monitor internet users' social media activity to find evidence of protest involvement. The private company Synesis, which was sanctioned by the European Union (EU), reportedly helped authorities identify and arrest demonstrators after the 2020 elections by providing video surveillance technology with facial recognition.

Voicing criticism of public officials and security forces on social media platforms, including sharing posts from other users or media sites that have been labeled "extremist," can lead to criminal charges. Security forces have violently detained and arrested people who had posted allegedly critical or insulting comments about state officials on social media. Defamation charges were used to prosecute such speech, with ordinary internet users being sentenced to more than a year in prison. Local authorities routinely surveil and monitor individuals who publicly or privately display opposition symbols, including coded phrases or colors, and, since February 2022, antiwar signs or Ukrainian symbols and songs. People who participate in public antiwar appeals face criminal prosecution for "extremism" and "harming national security interests."

Security forces use various strategies to persecute political activists abroad. In 2021, for example, Belarusian authorities forced an Athens–Vilnius Ryanair flight to land in Minsk in order to arrest exiled blogger and opposition activist Raman Pratasevich. Authorities have also canceled the travel documents of dissidents abroad and harassed activists' relatives who remain in Belarus, including the families of Belarusian military volunteers in Ukraine.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

The government severely restricts freedom of assembly. Protests require permission from local authorities, who often arbitrarily deny it. The 2021 amendment to the law on mass events imposes strict authorization requirements and impedes organizers' ability to raise funds for protests.

During the 2020 electoral period, hundreds of thousands of people participated in unprecedented prodemocracy protests. Major campaign rallies for Tsikhanouskaya were held across the country. Police and military forces only partially succeeded in blocking people from congregating before voting day on August 9. In the following weeks, the regime deployed military equipment and armed riot police who indiscriminately attacked and arrested people, killing many. Numerous instances of cruel treatment, beatings, and torture of protesters were recorded, with total impunity for the security forces involved.

Under the criminal code, those who participate in an unauthorized mass event can face administrative fines or 15- to 30-day detention periods. The regime instrumentalized administrative detention against participants in the prodemocracy movement that began in 2020.

Antiwar protests were held in at least 12 Belarusian cities following the Russian invasion of Ukraine in February 2022. More than 800 people were arrested during the protests; most of those arrested were held for 15 days, with many being physically abused by security forces while detained.

Freedom of association is severely restricted. In January 2022, criminal-code amendments recriminalized participation in unregistered or dissolved organizations; those accused of participating in such organizations face steep fines and up to two years in prison.

Prior to the 2020 prodemocracy movement, few human rights groups managed to operate due to resource shortages and pressure from the authorities, and staff and supporters risked prosecution and fines for their activism.

NGOs and public associations, including prominent organizations like the Belarusian Association of Journalists, the Belarusian Helsinki Committee, and the Belarusian PEN Center, have been ordered to dissolve in recent years. According to Lawtrend, 757 NGOs were in forced-dissolution processes or were removed from an official register between 2021 and the end of 2022, while 416 had decided to self-liquidate. The government actively uses antiextremism legislation against independent organizations and individuals to restrict public outreach and suppress dissent.

Human rights activists who remained in the country following the 2020 prodemocracy protests have faced harassment and threats from security forces. During 2022, human rights activist Nasta Loika was repeatedly detained on a variety of spurious charges, including "extremism"; in December, Loika was further charged with two criminal offenses, including "violating public order." Loika remained in pretrial detention at year's end.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Independent labor unions face harassment, and their leaders are frequently fired and prosecuted for engaging in peaceful protests. No independent unions have been registered since 1999, when Lukashenka issued a decree setting extremely restrictive registration requirements.

Independent unions were prominent in the prodemocracy movement in 2020, striking to protest the fraudulent presidential election and police violence toward peaceful demonstrators. The state increasingly targeted and pressured workers to prevent them from going on strike. Union leaders and rank-and-file members were arrested, fined, dismissed from their posts, sent to psychiatric institutions, and forced into exile.

In 2021, security forces arrested at least 11 people, accusing them of involvement in an independent labor movement. The arrested workers faced charges of treason and conspiracy to seize power, with a maximum punishment of 15 years in prison. According to the Belarusian Independent Trade Union, approximately 40 trade union activists were imprisoned as of December 2022.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Courts are entirely subservient to President Lukashenka, who appoints Supreme Court justices with the approval of the rubber-stamp parliament.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

The right to a fair trial is not respected and often flatly dismissed in cases with political overtones. In a departure from international norms, the power to extend pretrial detention lies with a prosecutor rather than a judge. The absence of independent oversight allows police to routinely violate legal procedures. The government regularly attacks attorneys, who often are the only connection between imprisoned activists and their families and society.

Since the 2020 presidential campaign, arbitrary arrests, police brutality and torture, and the denial of due process have continued with impunity. Lawyers are often denied the right to meet with their defendants. Many lawyers defending political prisoners were disbarred or arrested. In July 2022, Lukashenka enacted a law permitting the authorities to conduct trials in absentia for crimes that "entail a threat to national security."

Law enforcement agencies have broad powers to employ physical force against suspects, who have little opportunity for recourse if they are abused. Human rights groups continue to document instances of beatings, torture, and intimidation during detention. During and after the presidential election period in 2020 and throughout 2021, detained peaceful prodemocracy protesters experienced cruel and dehumanizing treatment during their arrests, while being transported to detention centers and when incarcerated. Excessive force has been used to extract confessions from detainees. Extracted confessions, where detainees appear beaten, distressed, and humiliated, have been recorded, published, and distributed by state agencies, violating the principle of human dignity and the right to a fair trial.

Belarus served as a staging ground for Russian military forces before and during their invasion of Ukraine in February 2022, and President Lukashenka continued to allow Russian troops to operate from Belarusian territory through year's end. Belarusian dissidents have resisted the Russian military presence, with so-called railway partisans notably attacking Belarusian rail infrastructure; their sabotage prevented the transit of Russian military forces and equipment to Ukraine. Authorities quickly labeled the railway partisans as "terrorists," and used excessive force to detain several people for their alleged participation. In May, Lukashenka enacted new legislation to make such attacks punishable by death; as of December, several people had been convicted of engaging in rail sabotage and received lengthy prison sentences.

Authorities have sought to increase the dominance of the Russian language. Official usage of Belarusian remains rare. The UN Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) recognizes Belarusian as "vulnerable." Since Lukashenka became president, the share of first graders who study in Belarusian fell from 40 to under 10 percent as of 2019. During 2022, authorities continued to restrict the use of the Belarusian language, including by refusing to provide Belarusian-language materials to voters before or during the constitutional referendum in February. The authorities also arbitrarily shut down at least one publishing house specializing in Belarusian-language publications and designated numerous Belarusian-language books and newspapers as "extremist materials" during the year.

Women are prohibited from entering 181 different occupations, and societal norms in much of the country hold that women should be mothers or housewives. However, Tsikhanouskaya's mass support in the prodemocracy movement has become a slight counter to long-standing gender roles.

LGBT+ people face widespread societal discrimination, and law enforcement authorities are reluctant to investigate and prosecute attacks against them.

In 2021, Belarusian authorities began deliberately facilitating the passage of asylum seekers and migrants—most of them from Iraq—through Belarus to the borders of the EU. Polish and Belarusian authorities used tear gas and water cannons against the migrants, who were left in freezing temperatures without adequate shelter, supplies, and assistance. Approximately 2,000 asylum seekers, refugees, and migrants were stranded in Belarus by the end of 2021, and over 1,000 people chose to return home voluntarily as of the end of that year. Belarusian authorities continued to push asylum seekers and migrants to cross the EU border throughout 2022, though individuals have also left via repatriation flights; over 3,800 Iraqis were repatriated according to the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies in its November 2021–May 2022 report.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Opposition activists are occasionally detained at the border for lengthy searches. Passports are used as a primary identity document in Belarus, and authorities are known to harass people living in a different location than indicated by domestic stamps in their passport. Routine citizenship and documentation services abroad have been restricted, resulting in severe delays or denial of service for people who fled the country for political reasons.

On numerous occasions, authorities have forced the expulsion of politically active Belarusians since 2020, including Tsikhanouskaya and Catholic archbishop Kondrusiewicz. That December, authorities prohibited Belarusians from leaving the country at land border crossings, except with Russia, ostensibly to prevent the spread of COVID-19; the policy was likely enforced to prevent political dissidents from fleeing. In May 2021, the EU banned Belarusian airlines from traveling over its airspace and accessing its airports. This has limited travel options for Belarusian citizens and significantly increased the cost of leaving the country. Further restrictions on air travel were imposed in response to the border crisis instigated by the Belarusian authorities.

Though limits on economic freedom have eased in recent years, state interference still affects the economy and profitable business owners are never secure from arbitrary government pressure and harassment. Many businesspeople that became involved in the postelection prodemocracy efforts, often to support victims of human rights abuses or to incentivize policemen to resign from law enforcement, were criminally prosecuted on groundless claims. Other businesses and their owners who supported candidates other than Lukashenka have been arrested under false pretense. Multiple businesses relocated their employees to neighboring countries for fear of state harassment or prosecution.

In October 2022, Lukashenka announced price regulation measures for 370 consumer goods. At least one chain store was heavily fined and more than 40 people were detained for unsanctioned price increases before year's end; in one case, a business owner received a suspended sentence of to up to two years in prison for "abuse of office."

Domestic violence is a pervasive problem in Belarus, and police register about 150,000 incidents per year. In 2018, Lukashenka blocked a draft law on the prevention of domestic violence jointly developed by law enforcement agencies and civil society representatives, calling attitudes against the corporal punishment of children "nonsense from the West." Threats of losing custody of children are often used to intimidate and harass political activists.

The constitution explicitly bans same-sex marriage. Constitutional amendments made in 2022 define marriage as a union solely between a man and a woman. The amendments further declare that marriage, motherhood, and fatherhood are protected by the state, creating further obstacles for same-sex partners to obtain legal recognition and to plan their family life. The Belarusian government led a 2016 effort to block LGBT+ rights from being part of a UN international initiative focused on urban areas.

Mandatory unpaid national workdays, postgraduate employment allocation, compulsory labor for inmates in state rehabilitation facilities, and restrictions on leaving employment in certain industries have led labor activists to conclude that all Belarusian citizens experience forced labor at some stage of their life. Many women become victims of international sex trafficking.

Belgium

Population: 11,600,000
Capital: Brussels
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Belgium is a stable electoral democracy with a long record of peaceful transfers of power. Political rights and civil liberties are legally guaranteed and largely respected. Major concerns in recent years have included the threat of terrorism, corruption scandals, and rising right-wing nationalism and xenophobia.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Four people were arrested in September for allegedly planning to kidnap Belgium's justice minister, who police believe was targeted due to his efforts to crack down on international drug trafficking. Investigations into the alleged plot remained ongoing at year's end.
- Several senior officials of the Walloon parliament, including its president, resigned in December after being implicated in a corruption scandal involving the misuse of public funds. The same month, Marc Tarabella, a Belgian politician and member of the European Parliament, was accused of accepting illegitimate funds from Qatar; investigations into the allegations against Tarabella continued through year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Belgian monarchy is largely ceremonial, although the king retains constitutional authority to mediate the process of government formation. He was particularly active in this role in 2020 as negotiations over a new government stalled. The prime minister, who is the leader of the majority party or coalition, is appointed by the monarch and approved by the legislature. In late September 2020, seven parties forged a parliamentary majority under the leadership of Alexander De Croo of the Open Flemish Liberals and Democrats party, who was sworn in as prime minister that October.

Belgium's multilayered subnational administrative units have their own governments with varying degrees of autonomy. In addition to the three main geographic divisions of French-speaking Wallonia in the south, Flemish-speaking Flanders in the north, and the bilingual Brussels capital region, there are overlapping governments for the French community, the Flemish community, and the much smaller German-speaking community.

Belgium's federal parliament consists of two houses: the Chamber of Representatives and the Senate. The 150 members of the lower house are elected directly by proportional representation. The Senate is composed of 50 members selected by community and regional parliaments, and an additional 10 members chosen by the first 50 based on the results of the Chamber of Representatives elections. Members serve five-year terms in both houses, and elections are generally free and fair.

In the May 2019 elections, establishment parties lost significant shares of support to parties on the far left and far right of the political spectrum. For example, the right-wing, nationalist New Flemish Alliance (N-VA) lost some power, taking 25 seats in the Chamber of Representatives (down 8 seats), but the far-right, separatist Flemish Interest (VB) party won 18 seats, a gain of 15. On the left, the francophone Socialist Party (PS) won 20 seats, down 3 from the previous election, while the Greens—composed of the francophone Ecolo and their Flemish-speaking counterpart Groen—won a combined 21 seats. The leftist Workers' Party of Belgium (PvdA in Flemish, PTB in French) also made major gains, rising from 2 seats to 12. A total of 12 parties won seats in the lower house. It took until September 2020 to form a new government, a delay that is not historically unusual for Belgium.

In 2019, the German-speaking community launched a system of participatory democracy in which citizens are selected by lot to join a Citizens' Council, which provides input on policy matters. A similar program has been introduced in the local parliaments in the Brussels region, and plans to launch related initiatives in other regions and at the national level were underway as of 2022.

Despite the complexity of the political system, the electoral laws and framework are generally fair and impartially implemented.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

The party system is robust but highly fragmented, with separate Flemish and francophone political parties representing various positions on the left-right spectrum.

Belgium's coalition-based politics allow individual parties to move easily in and out of government, and there is a long record of peaceful transfers of power between rival parties at the federal level. However, the 2019 regional and federal elections showed decreasing support for establishment parties and increasing support for far-right, far-left, and green parties across the country. The increasing power of the Flemish right-wing N-VA and the far-right VB makes majority coalitions that exclude these nationalist parties increasingly difficult to assemble. The N-VA and VB became the two largest parties in Flanders after the 2019 elections, and they criticized the formation in 2020 of a federal government that lacked their participation.

The political choices of voters and candidates are generally free from undue interference.

Members of racial, ethnic, religious, and other minority groups are free to participate in national and subnational politics, and women enjoy full political rights. In the 2019 elections, women were elected to 65 seats out of 150 in the Chamber of Representatives; this 43 percent share represented a rise of 4 percentage points from the 2014 elections. The Senate must have a minimum of 20 women senators.

In general, the larger parties incorporate members of minority groups, including in senior positions. In 2019, Belgians elected Petra De Sutter, an openly transgender member of the Groen party, as a member of the European Parliament; in 2020, De Sutter became Belgium's deputy prime minister. In May 2021, Ihsane Haouach, who wears a hijab, was appointed as government commissioner at the Institute for the Equality of Women and Men. However, Haouach resigned her post that July after facing months of anti-Muslim harassment.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

Elected officials generally adopt and implement laws and policies without improper interference from unelected entities.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Public officials can face heavy fines and up to 10 years' imprisonment for corruption-related offenses, and enforcement of anticorruption legislation is generally adequate. However, recent corruption scandals have drawn attention to abuses involving politicians who hold multiple positions on the boards of public and private entities, with some officials holding more than a dozen paid positions. The Group of States against Corruption (GRECO), a Council of Europe (CoE) anticorruption body, has repeatedly warned about Belgium's slow implementation of recommended anticorruption reforms.

Two new laws improving whistleblower protections in line with EU requirements were passed in November and December 2022. The legislation, which provides protections in both the private and public sectors, had not yet entered into force at year's end.

Several senior officials of the Walloon parliament, including its president, resigned in December 2022 after being implicated in a scandal involving the misuse of public funds. The same month, Marc Tarabella, a PS politician and member of European Parliament, was suspended from the PS following allegations that he had accepted illicit funds from Qatar. Investigations into Tarabella's involvement in the so-called Qatargate corruption scandal were ongoing at year's end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The law provides mechanisms for the public to access government information, and these procedures generally function in practice. Legislators and other high-ranking elected officials are required by law to regularly disclose their assets as well as paid or unpaid mandates, executive functions, and occupations to the Court of Audit. Information about asset declarations is not publicly accessible, but declarations of interests are published in the official government gazette. In recent years, both GRECO and the European Commission have recommended that Belgium adopt stronger regulations governing interactions between lobbyists and high-level government officials, including members of parliament.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is guaranteed by the constitution and generally respected by the government. Belgians have access to numerous public and private media outlets that present a range of views. Internet access is unrestricted. While online harassment cases are generally rare, the CoE issued several alerts about the online and offline harassment of journalists during 2022.

More than half of the country's population identifies as Roman Catholic. Freedom of religion is generally protected, but members of minority religious groups have complained of discrimination and harassment. A ban on the partial or total covering of the face in public locations, which is understood to target Muslims, has been in effect since 2011. The rise of nationalist and far-right parties in Flanders has contributed to the normalization of anti-Muslim rhetoric.

Several high-profile anti-Muslim incidents have occurred in recent years. In one case in 2021, a court ordered a Brussels-based public transport company to pay €51,000 ($60,700) in damages to a woman who was denied a job because she wears a hijab. The court found that preventing individuals from wearing religious symbols in the workplace constitutes discrimination and disproportionately affects women.

The government does not restrict academic freedom. Schools are free from political indoctrination, and there are no significant impediments to scholarly research or discussion.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is open and vibrant, and freedom of expression is guaranteed by the constitution, though there are laws banning incitement to hatred and other such offenses, which occasionally lead to prosecutions, fines, and jail terms.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected by law and generally respected in practice.

In January 2022, large protests against COVID-19-related restrictions in Brussels saw police use tear gas and water cannons to disperse protesters who were vandalizing buildings, setting fires, and throwing objects at police. Approximately 70 people were arrested, and 12 demonstrators and 3 police officers were injured. Other large protests held during the year took place without incident.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is guaranteed by the constitution, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate without undue restrictions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers at companies that employ more than 50 people have the right to organize and join unions and to bargain collectively. Employers found guilty of firing workers because of union activities are required to reinstate the workers or pay an indemnity.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent by law and in practice, and court rulings are duly enforced by other state entities.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The judicial process generally guarantees a fair trial, and the authorities typically observe safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. Extraordinary security measures adopted in the period surrounding terrorist attacks in 2015 and 2016 have eased significantly in the years since, though a 2017 legal change increased the maximum length of detention in police custody without a judicial order from 24 to 48 hours.

Although conditions in prisons and detention centers meet most international standards, the facilities continue to suffer from overcrowding and other problematic living conditions.

Drug trafficking and related violence is a problem. In September 2022, four people were arrested for allegedly plotting to kidnap Belgium's justice minister, who police believe was targeted due to his efforts to crack down on international drug trafficking. Investigations into the incident remained ongoing at year's end.

According to the Belgian Coordination Body for Threat Analysis (OCAM), the threat from far-right extremism has increased in recent years. In September 2022, a series of antiterror police raids targeting suspected right-wing extremists were conducted across the country. One man was shot and killed during a raid after he allegedly opened fire on the police; the Antwerp prosecutor's office later opened an investigation into the incident.

Antidiscrimination legislation prohibits bias and acts of hatred and incitement based on categories including gender, race, ethnicity, nationality, and sexual orientation. Nevertheless, some groups, including immigrants, Belgians of African descent, and Romany residents, continue to face a degree of discrimination in practice.

In 2019, UN experts stated that racial discrimination is institutionally endemic in Belgium and called for recognition of the country's history of human rights abuses during its colonial rule over what is now the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Following debates prompted by the Black Lives Matter protests in 2020, King Philippe expressed regrets over Belgian colonial rule. Although politicians have gradually become aware of the need for critical discussion about the country's past, the rising influence of hard-right nationalist parties in Flanders has been accompanied by racism and xenophobia.

Despite robust legal protections for the rights of LGBT+ people, LGBT+ individuals sometimes face instances of violence and discrimination in practice.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The law provides for freedom of domestic movement and foreign travel, and the government upholds these rights in practice.

The legal framework supports property rights, and commercial activity is regulated without arbitrary interference.

There are few significant restrictions on personal social freedoms. Belgium legalized same-sex marriage in 2003, and in 2006 same-sex couples gained the right to adopt children.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Immigration has increased in recent years, but non–European Union immigrants and their Belgian-born children remain poorly integrated into the labor market.

Belize

Population: 400,000
Capital: Belmopan
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Belize is a democracy that has experienced regular rotations of power through competitive elections. Civil liberties are mostly respected. Government corruption is a concern, as is the high rate of violent crime. Authorities have been slow to address persistent problems of police brutality and human trafficking within the country's borders.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In October, the parliament passed the Senior Courts Bill and the 12th Constitutional Amendment, which provided for fundamental reforms of the country's judicial system. The Senior Courts Bill was enacted in November, and included provisions that replaced the Supreme Court with a new High Court and established a new Senior Court system.
- Also in October, the parliament passed the People's Constitution Commission Act, beginning the process of comprehensive constitutional reform. The act was signed into law in November, and the People's Constitution Commission (PCC), tasked with reviewing the existing constitution and holding consultations on reforms, was officially launched that month.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, usually the leader of the largest party in the parliament, is head of government. Formally, the prime minister is appointed by the governor general, who represents the British monarch as head of state. The legitimacy of the prime minister is largely dependent on the conduct of legislative elections, which are typically credible and well administered. After 17 years in opposition, the People's United Party (PUP), under the leadership of Johnny Briceño, won a convincing victory in the 2020 elections, defeating the United Democratic Party (UDP).

The 31 members of the House of Representatives are directly elected to five-year terms. The Senate has 12 seats. The ruling party, the opposition, and several civil associations select the senators, who are then appointed by the governor general.

In the 2020 legislative polls, the opposition PUP won a landslide victory. Turnout was over 81 percent, the highest since 1998.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair, although there is some politicization of the Elections and Boundaries Commission (EBC). There are large differences in constituency size, and boundaries have not changed since 1984. In February 2022, a redistricting task force was created to make recommendations on how the disparities could be reduced. The redistricting process faced several delays in 2022, leading members of the opposition to express concerns about potential political interference in the process.

In October 2022, the parliament passed the People's Constitution Commission Act, beginning the process of comprehensive constitutional reform. The legislation was enacted in November, and the People's Constitution Commission (PCC) was officially launched that month. The PCC, which is made up of representatives from Belize's main political parties and 19 civil society organizations, is tasked with reviewing the existing constitution, holding consultations on constitutional reforms across Belize and among the Belizean diaspora, and issuing a final report on its findings.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

Political parties can organize freely. The effects of the country's "first-past-the-post" electoral system and a degree of political clientelism have entrenched the country's two largest parties.

The political system allows for opposition parties to increase their support or gain power through elections. Since 1984, there have been fairly regular transfers of power between the two main parties.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Recent elections, including those in 2020, have been viewed as generally free of undue interference from entities outside the democratic political sphere. However, the Organization of American States (OAS) has raised concerns about the potential impact of unregulated campaign financing on the political process.

Women are reasonably well represented in the political system, holding five seats in the current House of Representatives and six seats in the Senate. In municipal elections in 2021, 24 women were elected, and the capital city, Belmopan, elected its first woman mayor.

Indigenous people, particularly those of Mayan descent, who make up 11 percent of the population, are not well represented in politics. Mestizo Belizeans and Afro-Indigenous peoples are better integrated into the political system. LGBT+ people face discrimination, which affects their ability to engage fully in political and electoral processes. A collection of religious denominations nominates one member of the Senate, but non-Christian groups are not included in the process.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

The elected prime minister, cabinet, and national legislative representatives are duly seated following elections and are able to freely determine the policies of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Belize continues to struggle with corruption, and there is little political will to address the problem. Anticorruption laws are poorly enforced.

In July 2022, Moises Cal, a leading member of the PUP—who in 2007 was accused of various acts of corruption, including bribery and money laundering—was appointed chairman of the Public Service Commission (PSC). Cal withdrew his name from consideration in August, before the appointment was confirmed, due to widespread opposition to his candidacy.

In November 2022, the US government accused high-ranking UDP member John Saldivar of "significant corruption," including providing Belizean immigration documents in return for bribes and interfering in public processes for personal gain while he was a government official.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The government generally engages in policymaking with openness and transparency. However, a 2020 Supreme Court ruling found that the UDP government had improperly spent $645 million, and had unconstitutionally sidelined the legislature on budgetary and finance matters.

There are also persistent issues with procurement processes and officials' financial disclosure statements. Members of Belize's business community have alleged that favoritism influences the government's awarding of licenses and public contracts. The Prevention of Corruption in Public Life Act, which requires elected officials to submit annual financial statements, is poorly enforced.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 53 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of the press, though it includes exceptions for interests such as national security, public order, and morality. While reporting generally covers a wide range of viewpoints in practice, journalists sometimes face threats, physical harassment, or assault in the course of their work.

In January 2022, the cabinet approved the replacement of the existing Libel and Defamation Act with a new Defamation Act. Among other things, the new Defamation Act, which became law in August, broadened the scope of what can be considered defamatory. Critics have raised concerns about restrictions the new law may place on the media.

Religious freedom is constitutionally protected and largely respected in practice.

Academic freedom is generally respected.

There are no significant constraints on individual expression.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected, and the government generally respects this right.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally free from government interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Unions are free to form and operate, and employers have been penalized for violating union rights under the labor code. There are some restrictions on the right to strike, and while labor unions are active and politically influential, their ability to protect workers' rights is limited in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent, despite inadequate resources and periodic attempts by political and business interests to interfere with its composition. After coming to power in 2020, the PUP government pledged to provide greater resources to the judiciary; however, as of October 2022, extra resources have not been forthcoming.

In April 2021, the parliament passed new legislation requiring Supreme Court and Court of Appeal judges to deliver written judgments within six months or face dismissal.

In October 2022, the parliament passed the Senior Courts Bill, which will reform the country's judicial system, and the 12th Constitutional Amendment, which will allow the Senior Courts Bill to be enacted. According to the new legislation, the Supreme Court will be replaced with a new High Court, which, with the Court of Appeal, will comprise a new Senior Court system. The Senior Courts Bill was signed into law in November.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Detainees and defendants are guaranteed a range of legal rights, which are mostly respected in practice. However, police have reportedly detained suspects without charge for longer than is permitted by the law and have used the threat of extended detention to intimidate suspects. Judicial delays and a large backlog of cases contribute to lengthy trials and other procedures, with many defendants spending years in pretrial detention.

Belize is free from major threats to physical security, such as war and insurgencies, but the long-running border dispute with Guatemala remains unresolved. Tensions have lessened in recent years, but there are occasional incidents.

Belize remains among the countries with the highest per capita murder rates in the world. According to government statistics, in 2022, there were 113 homicides, compared to 125 in 2021. Much of the violence is localized around the south side of Belize City.

Cases of police brutality continue to be reported. In one case in December 2022, police used excessive force while arresting a man accused of smoking marijuana in public. The man, who had hemophilia, later died from injuries allegedly sustained from severe beatings during his arrest and while in police custody.

The constitution and laws protect against many forms of discrimination, but there are no specific provisions addressing sexual orientation or gender identity.

Discrimination against LGBT+ people persists. In 2016, the Supreme Court struck down a provision of the criminal code that outlawed same-sex sexual activity. In December 2019, the Court of Appeal upheld the unconstitutionality of the criminal code article and confirmed that constitutional freedom of expression and antidiscrimination protections include sexual orientation.

Women face employment discrimination and are less likely than men to hold managerial positions. However, the government has actively pursued programs aimed at encouraging gender equality and protecting women's rights.

Migration into Belize has increased significantly in recent years, and government estimates suggest that up to 15 percent of the country's population is without official documentation. Migrants face legal and social challenges to integration into Belizean society, and some immigrants have faced detention in Belize Central Prison for entering the country illegally. In August 2022, an amnesty program began to allow undocumented immigrants to gain permanent residency under certain conditions. The application process was originally set to run until November 2022, but that month, the government extended the program to February 2023.

No separate legal system or laws specifically protect Indigenous people.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The government generally respects freedom of internal movement and foreign travel.

Individuals have the right to own property and establish private businesses. However, legal regulations are at times poorly enforced. Leaders of the Indigenous Maya community say their ancestral land rights are not protected, particularly with regard to oil exploration and logging activities. In 2016, the Belizean government responded to a 2015 Caribbean Court of Justice (CCJ) ruling requiring recognition of Mayan land rights by setting up a commission to facilitate implementation of the court's decision, but progress has been slow. As of 2022, the government has continued to make decisions on pertinent issues without obtaining the consent of Indigenous leaders or representatives.

Personal social freedoms are generally respected, though domestic violence remains a serious problem despite government measures to combat it. Rape is illegal, but reporting and conviction rates are low, and sentences are sometimes light.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Some legal protections against exploitative working conditions are respected and enforced. However, Belizean and foreign women and girls are vulnerable to sex trafficking, and migrant workers are sometimes subjected to forced labor in agriculture, fisheries, and retail businesses. The US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report recognized the government's "significant efforts" to combat trafficking, but also noted that the government has failed to "adequately address official complicity in trafficking crimes."

Benin

Population: 13,400,000
Capital: Porto-Novo
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Benin had been among the most stable democracies in sub-Saharan Africa, but President Patrice Talon began using the justice system to attack his political opponents after taking office in 2016, and new electoral rules and a crackdown on his political opponents enabled him to consolidate his power in 2021. Deadly police violence at political protests, arrests of activists, and other restrictions on civil liberties have become increasingly problematic in recent years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Approximately fifty members of the opposition who had been imprisoned during the 2021 election period were released in June and July; however, major opposition figures, including imprisoned 2021 presidential candidate Reckya Madougou, remained behind bars through year's end.
- In November, the Democrats, Benin's main opposition party, were barred from contesting the 2023 legislative elections for failing to provide required tax information; the party was ultimately allowed to register later that month after the Constitutional Court ruled in its favor. At year's end, seven parties—including three opposition parties—had been registered for the 2023 elections.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 17 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president is elected by popular vote for up to two five-year terms and serves as both the chief of state and head of government. In 2021, Patrice Talon won reelection as president with 86 percent of the vote. The authorities had disqualified, arrested, or forced into exile the major opposition candidates, leaving only two opponents who posed no significant competition. Elected members of progovernment parties had veto power over which candidates qualified for the ballot, and some opposition parties boycotted the election. Peaceful protesters against the unfair and noncompetitive contest were injured, and at least five people were killed after security forces fired tear gas and live ammunition into the air. Official voter turnout was 50 percent, a historic low for the country's multiparty presidential contests; civil society groups estimate turnout at 26 percent. Observers described election day as "calm" and "orderly."

Constitutional amendments created the largely ceremonial position of vice president in 2019. Mariam Chabi Talata, Talon's running mate in 2021, became the first to hold the office.

Delegates to the 83-member, unicameral National Assembly serve four-year terms and are elected by proportional representation. The 2019 legislative elections were neither free nor fair, as new electoral rules effectively prevented all opposition parties from participating. Observers canceled poll-monitoring plans for fear of violence, turnout fell to about a quarter of eligible voters amid an opposition boycott, there was an internet shutdown on election day, and security forces violently suppressed protests before and after balloting, resulting in several deaths.

Only the two progovernment parties on the ballot won seats. In November 2021, the new National Assembly adopted constitutional amendments, including provisions imposing three-term limits on legislators, expanding the body to 109 seats, and extending terms to five years beginning in 2026 to align them with those of the president. The government ignored a call by the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights (AfCHPR) for these amendments' repeal before the presidential election.

Municipal elections were held in 2020, ignoring an AfCHPR order to suspend them and ensure opposition participation. Sébastien Ajavon, a businessman living in exile after receiving a drug trafficking conviction in 2018, had sued after opposition parties were barred from participating. The Progressive Union and the Republican Bloc won most local council seats, while the Cowry Forces for an Emerging Benin (FCBE), the only opposition group to field candidates, won 14 percent of them. In 2021, the AfCHPR ruled in Ajavon's case that Benin had violated its human rights obligations.

Elections are conducted by the Autonomous National Electoral Commission (CENA). Following the passage of a restrictive electoral law in 2018, the Constitutional Court ruled that parties must obtain a "certificate of conformity" from the Interior Ministry. In 2019, CENA approved only two progovernment parties for the legislative election. CENA also barred most opposition groups from the 2020 local elections.

Legislative elections scheduled for 2023 will be run by a restructured CENA largely appointed by Talon and his allies. As of the end of 2022, seven parties—four progovernment, three opposition—were registered to contest the 2023 elections. CENA initially disqualified the main opposition party, the Democrats, in November 2022 for failing to provide required tax information. The party was ultimately allowed to register after appealing the decision to the Constitutional Court, which found in the party's favor later that month.

Due to a 2019 amendment requiring presidential candidates to be endorsed by 10 percent of mayors and members of the National Assembly, the disqualifications of opposition parties in the 2019 and 2020 elections empowered members of Talon's party to disqualify all but two candidates for the 2021 presidential election.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16

After multiparty elections were restored in 1991, Benin generally had a large number of active political parties. However, the 2018 electoral code established restrictive rules including an unusually high 10 percent national threshold and an onerous increase in obligatory financial deposits. Costs for presidential candidates were reduced in 2019, but other requirements were introduced, including the need for endorsements and a vice presidential candidate.

All opposition parties were excluded from the 2019 parliamentary contest. As of December 2022, three opposition parties had been permitted to register for the 2023 legislative elections.

The FCBE was able to put forward a candidate for the 2021 presidential election. Though the Democrats won recognition in December 2020, the party's presidential candidate, Reckya Madougou, was arrested before the election. The leader of a disqualified front of opposition parties, Joël Aïvo, was arrested shortly after the polls.

Talon's defeat of Lionel Zinsou, former president Thomas Boni Yayi's chosen successor in the 2016 election, marked Benin's fourth presidential transfer of power between rival groups since 1991.

However, Talon's government has since introduced significant obstacles to opposition parties and presidential candidates, and leading opposition figures have faced harassment and prosecution. Zinsou, Ajavon, and others have been sentenced in absentia to extensive sentences and remain in exile. Madougou and Aïvo were disqualified from the 2021 presidential ballot, arrested, and, in December of that year, sentenced to 20 and 10 years in prison, respectively. Approximately fifty members of the opposition imprisoned during 2021 were released in June and July 2022.

Under the 2019 constitutional amendments, no president can serve more than two terms in their life, even if they are nonconsecutive; some alleged this provision was aimed at Boni Yayi.

Politics have generally been free from military interference. The role of personal wealth in politics has increased in recent years, with higher campaign costs and clientelist structures boosting the careers of wealthier politicians. Talon developed his private businesses in part by financing the campaigns of Boni Yayi and other elites and then securing lucrative contracts. After becoming president, Talon allegedly attempted to bribe lawmakers while working to secure passage of constitutional amendments.

Women and minority groups are not legally excluded from political participation, but cultural factors limit women's engagement. Women won just 7 percent of the seats in the 2019 parliamentary elections. Recent constitutional amendments reserve 24 seats for women in the next legislative term. Benin's first vice president, Mariam Chabi Talata, is a woman.

Benin has historically been divided between northern and southern ethnic groups, and political parties often rely on ethnic bases of support. Southern-born Talon selected most of his political appointees from the southern Gbe-speaking region. The 2019 election of a southerner as National Assembly president broke with a tradition where legislative leaders and chief executives come from different regions. Vice President Talata is from the north.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

The president and the legislature generally determine government policy. However, the president and legislative representatives were not elected freely or fairly, and the lack of opposition members seriously undermines the legislature's role as an independent branch of government.

The government does not consistently implement policy throughout Benin. In many rural areas, the state struggles to deliver basic services, and citizens instead rely on local customary and religious leaders.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains widespread. Corrupt officials rarely face prosecution, contributing to a culture of impunity. In 2020, the National Anti-Corruption Authority (ANLC) was dissolved to be succeeded by the High Commission for the Prevention of Corruption (HCPC), which has the authority to refer corruption cases to court. The law establishing this office also removed aspects of public officials' asset declaration requirements.

The Court of Punishment of Economic Crimes and Terrorism (CRIET) was established in 2018 to prosecute corruption, drug trafficking, and terrorism cases, but critics claim it targets political opponents and journalists.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The 2015 Information and Communication Code provides for public access to government records. However, information deemed sensitive, including national security, trade, and judicial documents, remains restricted.

A law passed in 2020 repealed asset declaration provisions for presidential candidates and government officials, and a 2021 joint report by the Clingendael Institute and the Armed Conflict Location and Event Data Project (ACLED) indicates that the government is deliberately concealing increasingly violent communal conflicts in the north from the public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 42 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression are somewhat respected, and print outlets have expressed a wide variety of viewpoints. However, media outlets have encountered new scrutiny and restrictions under the Talon administration.

Defamation remains a crime punishable by fines, and media outlets critical of the government have increasingly risked suspension. Major television broadcasters have been shuttered by the High Authority for Audiovisual Media and Communication (HAAC) and remain so, despite court orders reversing those actions. In 2020, the HAAC banned all "unauthorized" online news outlets, suspending three outlets temporarily; others ignored the order.

A 2017 digital media law allows for the prosecution and imprisonment of journalists for online content that is allegedly false or harasses individuals.

In February 2022, Beninese journalist Flore Nobime and Dutch journalist Olivier van Beemen were arrested and held for four days on specious charges of espionage after failing to notify authorities that they would be working near Pendjari National Park. The charges were ultimately dropped, but authorities ordered that van Beemen be deported. In December, a journalist was arrested after publishing a story on alleged extrajudicial executions by the police; he was detained for two days and charged with spreading false news to disturb the peace. If convicted, he faces up to 6 months' imprisonment and a fine of 500,000 Central African francs ($807).

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice.

Academic freedom is largely respected.

There are no major restrictions on personal expression, and individuals generally are not subject to surveillance or reprisals when discussing political or other sensitive matters.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly has traditionally been respected; permit and registration requirements for demonstrations are not always enforced. A COVID-19-related ban on gatherings of more than 50 people, which authorities had sometimes used to prevent political opponents from organizing meetings and rallies, was lifted in March 2022.

Security forces violently dispersed opposition protests before the election in 2021 by firing tear gas and live ammunition into the air, resulting in at least five civilian deaths.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), including human rights groups, generally operate freely, but individual activists have been arrested in increasing numbers. Large numbers of political figures and activists were arrested leading up to and after the 2021 presidential election; several of those arrested at that time were released in 2022.

New regulations included in a 2021 draft law would require civil society organizations to renew their registration and pay a significant fee, which may limit small NGOs' ability to operate and enable the authorities to withdraw the registration of organizations that criticize the government. Beninese NGOs can no longer bring cases to the AfCHPR after Benin withdrew from a relevant protocol in 2020.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers, except certain civil servants and public employees, have the right to form and join unions, and to bargain collectively, with some restrictions. Public employees in the defense, health, justice, and security sectors are barred from striking; workers in other sectors may strike for a maximum of 10 days per year.

The National Assembly voted to ban workers in the hydrocarbon sector and at the port and airport in Cotonou from striking in October 2022, following a September strike by air traffic controllers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Although the judiciary has demonstrated some independence, the courts are susceptible to corruption. Judges are not nominated or promoted transparently.

Judicial independence was undermined when President Talon's personal lawyer, Joseph Djogbénou, was named Constitutional Court president in 2018. The court has since issued a number of decisions that favor the government, intensifying concerns about its autonomy. Djogbénou stepped down in July 2022 to take over leadership of the progovernment Progressive Union party.

CRIET also lacks independence. Judges were appointed by decree in 2018, in lieu of a transparent confirmation process. A CRIET judge resigned and fled the country in 2021, reporting that the court is used to prosecute Talon's political opponents.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Due process usually prevails in criminal and civil matters. However, judicial inefficiency, corruption, and a shortage of attorneys in the north inhibit the right to a fair trial. Lack of resources contributes to often lengthy pretrial detentions. Arbitrary arrests and detentions occasionally occur, sometimes with extreme sentencing, particularly in the CRIET.

During the 2021 presidential election period, reports suggest that large numbers of opposition leaders and activists were arrested by the authorities. Reckya Madougou—a prominent prodemocracy campaigner, former justice minister, and presidential candidate—was arrested and detained on spurious terrorism charges in March 2021 and, despite a lack of evidence, sentenced to 20 years in prison that December. In November 2022, the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention called for Madougou's release after ruling that her 2021 arrest was devoid of legal basis and that her detention is arbitrary.

According to international rights NGO Human Rights Without Frontiers (HRWF), hundreds of nonviolent individuals were arrested for politically motivated reasons in 2021.

The population is free from war and other major physical threats, though the threat of terrorism is growing in the north. Approximately 20 people were killed in terrorist attacks during 2022, including at least 12 soldiers.

Prison conditions are harsh. Prisoners face overcrowding, lack of access to food and water, and occasional physical abuse. Police brutality remains a problem, including beatings and torture of suspects. Superiors often shield perpetrators from prosecution.

Relations among Benin's ethnic groups are generally amicable, despite recent political tensions. Minority ethnic groups have typically been represented in government agencies, the civil service, and the armed forces. The constitution prohibits discrimination based on race, gender, and disability, but not sexual orientation. The 1996 penal code imposes a higher age of consent for same-sex sexual activity (21) than for heterosexual activity (13). LGBT+ people face social stigma and discrimination in practice. In February 2022, police detained and severely beat a transgender woman who had been the victim of an assault, forcing her to remain naked in detention for three days before releasing her without charge.

Women experience discrimination in employment and access to credit, health care, and education.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Individuals can generally move freely throughout Benin. However, in some rural areas, cultural traditions force women to remain indoors for extended periods.

Reforms to the business registration process, anticorruption efforts, and other regulatory changes since 2010 improved the business environment. However, property registration is difficult, and contract enforcement is inconsistent. Despite laws guaranteeing equal rights to inheritance for women, many women are denied the right to inherit property in practice.

Domestic violence remains a serious problem, and women are often reluctant to report domestic abuse. A 2003 law that prohibits female genital mutilation (FGM) was somewhat effective in reducing its occurrence, though the challenge persists. Marriage for those under 18 years old is prohibited, though exceptions are allowed for 14- to 17-year-olds with parental consent. Child marriage and forced marriage remain common in rural areas.

Legal protections against forced labor and other exploitative working conditions are unevenly enforced. Poor conditions are prevalent in the large informal sector, which was impacted by the COVID-19 pandemic. Human trafficking is widespread, despite increased convictions for the crime in recent years. The practice of sending young girls to wealthy families to work as domestic servants has led to cases of exploitation and sexual slavery. Children are also exploited for agricultural labor and work in various trades.

Bhutan

Population: 800,000
Capital: Thimphu
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Bhutan is a constitutional monarchy that has undergone democratic consolidation in recent years, which have featured credible elections and transfers of power to opposition parties. Ongoing problems include discrimination against Nepali-speaking and non-Buddhist minorities, the use of defamation cases to silence journalists, and media censorship.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Border tensions between Bhutan and China escalated after the January implementation of a new Chinese land border law, and subsequent construction of Chinese settlements inside Bhutanese territory.
- Two civil servants were reportedly forced to retire in April after talking to the media about their concerns over staffing at the Ministry of Agriculture and Forests.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 29 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The monarch is head of state, appoints a number of high officials, and retains a waning degree of influence over ministerial positions. King Jigme Khesar Namgyel Wangchuck formally succeeded his father in 2008.

The monarch nominates the leader of the majority party in the elected National Assembly to serve as prime minister. Lotay Tshering of the United Party of Bhutan (DNT) was appointed prime minister in November 2018.

The constitution provides for a bicameral Parliament, with a 25-seat upper house, the National Council, and a 47-seat lower house, the National Assembly. Members of both houses serve five-year terms. The king appoints five members of the nonpartisan National Council, and the remaining 20 are popularly elected. The National Assembly is entirely elected.

The April 2018 National Council election saw record turnout; some observers ascribed the higher turnout to reforms such as a new postal voting system that were designed to encourage voting and make casting ballots easier. The National Assembly election was held in two rounds in September and October 2018, with the two parties that won the most support in the first round advancing to the second. The DNT, which launched in 2013, won 30 seats. The Bhutan Peace and Prosperity Party (DPT) won 17. The then ruling People's Democratic Party did not advance to the runoff and therefore was not represented in the National Assembly.

Elections are administered by the Election Commission of Bhutan (ECB), which is generally considered impartial, although some of its regulations regarding which parties can compete in elections are controversial.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

Citizens must receive government approval to form political parties, and obtaining approval is sometimes difficult.

The opposition has a realistic chance to win elections, and there is now regular turnover in control of government. In 2018, the DNT won control of Parliament for the first time, and another opposition party, the DPT, finished second, despite having won no seats in 2013.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

India still has some influence over the choices of Bhutanese voters and politicians. The Chinese government does not have a diplomatic relationship with Thimphu but has courted Bhutanese leaders and worked to gain control of Bhutanese territory. Chinese forces have constructed villages, military outposts, and infrastructure inside Bhutan since 2015 and the implementation of a Chinese land border law in January 2022 exacerbated the problem.

The royal family retains influence, although it has significantly retreated from policy interference in recent years.

Electoral rules stipulate that political parties must not be limited to members of any regional, ethnic, or religious group. Citizenship rules are strict, and many Nepali-speaking people have not attained citizenship, leaving them disenfranchised.

Women are underrepresented in public office; traditional customs inhibit women's political participation, though electoral reforms introduced for the 2018 elections improved female turnout. Female representation in the National Assembly improved from 8.5 percent before the 2018 elections to 14.9 percent immediately after, and women held 17.4 percent of the chamber's seats at the end of 2022.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Bhutan has made a successful transition from a system in which the monarch dominated governance to one in which policies and legislation are mostly determined by elected officials. Beijing has widened its effective influence over policymaking in part of Bhutan through its settlement activity in recent years, effectively obstructing Thimphu's authority.

The Indian government maintains significant influence on Bhutanese policymaking, in part by supplying considerable foreign aid.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

The government generally enforces anticorruption laws effectively. The 2006 Anti-Corruption Act established whistleblower protections. The Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) is tasked with investigating and preventing graft and has successfully prosecuted several high-profile cases. The number of cases reported to the commission has grown each year, showing public interest and the ACC's widening utility.

Nepotism in public procurement and government employment remains problematic.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government has strengthened transparency by making the salaries of officials public and making the central and local budgets more open to review. A right to information law passed by the National Assembly in 2014 was designed to put the onus on agencies to release information. However, the National Council never approved the bill.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Add Q. Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? –1

The government has for decades attempted to repress the rights of ethnic Nepalis, forcing many of them to leave Bhutan. The government expelled a large percentage of Nepali speakers in the early 1990s. A resettlement effort aimed at transferring the refugees to other countries began in 2007, resulting in the resettlement of the majority of refugees. However, between 6,000 and 7,000 Bhutanese refugees remain in Nepal.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 32 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

While there are multiple private media outlets, many depend on advertising from state bodies, and the media environment remains subject to self-censorship. Powerful individuals can use defamation laws to retaliate against critics.

The Bhutan Information Communications and Media Act 2018 mandated the establishment of an independent Media Council, which became operational in 2019, to monitor the media for harmful content. Press freedom advocates fear the body will prompt further self-censorship.

The constitution protects freedom of religion, but local authorities are known to harass non-Buddhists.

Christian churches have often been unable to obtain registration from the government, which places constraints on their activities.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Few restrictions on academic freedom have been reported. However, Bhutanese university students are often hesitant to speak out on controversial political issues, including issues related to the monarchy, and practice self-censorship.

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected. However, under the National Security Act, speech that creates or attempts to create "hatred and disaffection among the people" or "misunderstanding or hostility between the government and people," among other offenses, can be punished with imprisonment. The broad language of the law makes it vulnerable to misuse. Two civil servants who worked at the Ministry of Agriculture and Forests were reportedly forced to retire in April 2022 after talking to the media about staffing concerns.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but this right is limited by government-imposed restrictions. Public gatherings require government permission, which is sometimes denied.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that work on issues related to ethnic Nepalis are not allowed to operate, but other local and international NGOs work on a wide range of issues. Under the 2007 Civil Society Organization Act, all new NGOs must register with the government. Registration is granted to NGOs that are determined by the government to be "not harmful to the peace and unity of the country."

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The constitution nominally guarantees the right of workers to form unions, but the right to strike is not legally protected. Workers may bargain collectively, and antiunion discrimination is prohibited.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16 (+1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The independence of the judiciary is largely respected. Senior judges are appointed by the king on the recommendation of the National Judicial Commission. However, the rulings of judges often lack consistency, and many people view the judiciary as corrupt.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Although the right to a fair trial is largely guaranteed and arbitrary arrest is not a widespread problem, plaintiffs and defendants in civil disputes often represent themselves. Many people who are unable to repay debts are held in detention, which is considered arbitrary under international law.

A number of political prisoners who were detained before Bhutan transitioned to its current democratic system remain imprisoned. Six were released in April 2022, but 49 reportedly remained in jail.

The civilian police force generally operates within the law, and incidents of excessive force are rare. In recent years, crime rates have generally been low. However, insurgents from the Indian state of Assam sometimes enter Bhutan and undermine security. Occasional instances of kidnapping and robbery occur along the border with India.

The constitution protects against discrimination based on sex, race, disability, language, religion, or societal status. However, Nepali-speaking people reportedly face employment discrimination and many forms of bias.

LGBT+ people experience societal discrimination and stigma. There are no legal protections for transgender people. In December 2020, both houses of Parliament completed a final vote to repeal provisions that criminalized same-sex sexual activity, and the king gave his assent in February 2021.

Discrimination in employment and education persists for women.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Bhutanese citizens generally have the freedom to travel domestically and internationally. However, the government has established different categories of citizenship, which restricts foreign travel for some. These restrictions reportedly have the greatest effect on Nepali speakers.

Individuals generally have rights to own property and establish businesses, but the process of registering property or a new business can be cumbersome. In recent years, the legal system has become more consistent, and establishing businesses has become easier. However, some ethnic Nepalis who lack a security clearance certificate face difficulties in starting a business.

Reports of domestic violence have increased in recent years. Societal taboos lead many incidents of rape and domestic violence to go unreported. Child marriage still occurs with some frequency.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Female household workers, who often come from rural areas or India, are vulnerable to forced labor and other abuse, as are foreign workers in the construction and hydropower sectors. Child labor persists, mostly in the agriculture and construction sectors.

The US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2022 noted that during the reporting period the Bhutanese government did not expand its overall antitrafficking efforts, with only one investigation into possible trafficking and no new prosecutions, although three traffickers were convicted in 2021.

Sex trafficking remains a problem; Bhutanese antitrafficking legislation does not criminalize all forms of this practice.

Bolivia

Population: 11,800,000
Capital: La Paz (administrative), Sucre (judicial)
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Bolivia is a democracy where credible elections have been held regularly. While mass protests and violence erupted after the disputed 2019 elections, new general elections held in 2020 and subnational elections held in 2021 were credible and fair, and stakeholders accepted the results. Nevertheless, the underlying causes of the political violence of 2019 still pose a threat to the country's political stability. Child labor and violence against women are persistent problems, independent and investigative journalists face harassment, and the judiciary is highly politicized and hampered by corruption.

- After being held in preventive detention for over a year on numerous charges, including terrorism and sedition, former interim president Jeanine Áñez Chavez was brought to trial in June; Áñez was convicted of illegally assuming the presidency and sentenced to 10 years in prison.
- In July, President Luis Arce's administration announced that the upcoming national census, planned for November, would be postponed until the summer of 2024, sparking violent protests and national strikes spearheaded by the opposition government of Santa Cruz Province. The violence began to decrease in November, and in December, the parliament passed a bill moving the census to March 2024, roughly three months earlier than originally announced.
- Prominent opposition leader and governor of the Santa Cruz Region Luis Camacho was arrested on charges of "terrorism" in December. Camacho remained in detention at year's end.
- In August, the National Association of Bolivian Journalists (ANPB) declared a "state of emergency" in the Bolivian press due to the persistent harassment and intimidation of members of the media, including by government officials.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Bolivia's president is both chief of state and head of government, and is directly elected to a five-year term. The presidential election in October 2020 took place after the results of the 2019 election were annulled. Early results of the 2019 presidential election suggested that a runoff between incumbent Evo Morales of the Movement for Socialism (MAS) and the main opposition candidate, former president Carlos Mesa of the Comunidad Ciudadana (Citizen Community) party, was likely. Soon after, election officials released an updated vote count showing Morales with an outright victory, prompting mass demonstrations. A report by an Organization of American States (OAS) electoral observation mission criticized the tally that showed Morales with an outright victory, saying it contradicted independent counts—though the credibility of this criticism has since been disputed by some independent analysts. A 2022 report by the US Department of State supported the conclusions of the OAS report.

In November 2019, as protests, counterprotests, and accompanying violence intensified in the weeks following the October poll, Morales, vice president Álvaro García Linera, and the heads of the Senate and the lower chamber resigned, after Morales lost the support of the military and police forces. Days later, Jeanine Áñez Chavez, a senior senator and the highest-ranking official in the line of succession who had not yet resigned, was endorsed by the Plurinational Constitutional Tribunal (TCP) to assume the presidency on an interim basis. Áñez indicated that she would only serve until a new election could be held, though in January 2020, she announced her candidacy for president in the next election. She eventually withdrew from the race in September 2020.

An agreement between the interim government and the parliament, mediated by the United Nations, the European Union (EU), and the Roman Catholic Church, established a new election date and a new Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE). The election was supposed to be held in May 2020; however, it was postponed until October due to the COVID-19 pandemic. The results of the October 2020 poll showed a clear victory for MAS candidate Luis Arce, who won over 55 percent of the vote, precluding the need for a runoff. Voter turnout was recorded at 84 percent. Multiple independent observer missions deemed the poll credible and fair, and competing parties and civil society stakeholders accepted the results.

The Plurinational Legislative Assembly (ALP) consists of a 130-member Chamber of Deputies and a 36-member Senate. Legislative terms are five years.

Due to allegations of irregularities in the 2019 general elections, the results of the vote for legislative representatives were considered invalid, and in November 2019, the ALP unanimously passed a law calling for new legislative elections to be held in October 2020. In those elections, the MAS won 75 of the 130 seats in the Chamber of Deputies and 21 seats in the Senate. The Citizen Community party secured 39 seats in the lower house and 11 seats in the upper house, and the new We Believe (Creemos) alliance won 16 and 4 seats in the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, respectively.

The final report of the OAS on the 2019 elections claimed that the elections' overall results were not verifiable, due to "willful manipulation" abetted by a biased TSE. After Morales's resignation in November 2019, the parliament agreed on a transparent formula to reconstitute an independent TSE in December of that year.

In the 2020 elections, the TSE's actions were widely considered independent and free from undue political influence. Though the day of the vote was postponed twice due to the coronavirus pandemic, the body nevertheless administered a safe vote with high turnout.

For years, Bolivian politics were characterized by MAS efforts to abolish presidential term limits. In 2017, MAS lawmakers overturned the articles in the constitution setting presidential term limits by consulting the TCP, a body the lawmakers themselves had appointed, despite voters rejecting this measure by referendum in 2016. In June 2021, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) found that term limits do not violate rights protected by the American Convention on Human Rights.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

Citizens have the right to organize political parties. MAS has dominated politics since 2005, drawing support from social movements, trade unions, and civil society actors. Morales's attempts to achieve a reelection bid were a core issue in the rancorous 2019 campaign period. The most prominent opposition party, Comunidad Ciudadana, attracted individuals who opposed his persistent efforts to extend his term.

In January 2020, Luis Fernando Camacho—the regional leader from Santa Cruz who led the mass protests against Morales in 2019—founded the Creemos alliance. Creemos quickly became the leading party in Santa Cruz, Bolivia's richest region, where Camacho was elected governor in 2021.

There are no formal institutional barriers that prevent opposition parties from participating in elections. Between 2005 and 2019, however, the overwhelming dominance of MAS, aided by its use of public resources to back its campaigns, made it difficult for opposition parties to gain power through elections. MAS candidates achieved sweeping victories in the local elections held in March 2021, but lost the mayoral races in Bolivia's largest cities, and in most gubernatorial races.

Following the 2019 presidential election, the OAS observer mission claimed that the results of the vote were manipulated by the TSE to prevent a runoff between Morales and Mesa, the second-place candidate. However, in 2020, independent researchers found that methodological errors significantly affected the OAS's results; when the errors were corrected, the researchers found no evidence of electoral fraud. Elections held in 2020 were generally considered to be free and fair.

People are generally free to make political decisions without undue influence from the military, foreign powers, or other influential groups. Although several violent confrontations occurred between supporters of competing parties in the run-up to the 2020 election, leaders of all parties called for their supporters to allow everyone to campaign freely and peacefully in each region. The levels of violence that preceded and followed the 2019 elections have decreased in severity since 2020.

However, tensions remained high into 2022, and violence between MAS supporters and supporters of the regionalist movement in Santa Cruz escalated after the Arce administration announced that a national census, originally planned for November 2022, would be postponed until 2024, purportedly due to administrative challenges. Due to the growing population of the Santa Cruz region, the census results are expected to trigger the reapportionment of government resources and parliamentary seats away from traditional MAS strongholds to Santa Cruz. By delaying the national census, opposition leaders say that the Arce administration has attempted to give unfair financial and parliamentary advantages to MAS. In November 2022, following several weeks of violent protests, the government agreed to hold the census in March 2024, roughly three months earlier than officials had originally announced.

Adult citizens enjoy universal and equal suffrage.

The constitution recognizes 36 Indigenous nationalities within a plurinational state, and formalizes political autonomy in Indigenous territories. Indigenous groups are well represented in government, and seven seats are reserved for Indigenous peoples in the Chamber of Deputies. However, the interests of Indigenous groups are often overlooked by politicians.

Formally, Bolivia has progressive legislation that guarantees equal political representation for women and seeks to protect them from political violence. While women are well represented in politics, holding 46 percent of seats in the Chamber of Deputies and nearly 56 percent of those in the Senate, sexism and patriarchal attitudes undermine their work, particularly at local levels.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials are free to set and implement government policy without undue interference from nonstate actors. However, opposition members charge that the MAS majority in the legislature has opened the space for strong executive influence on legislative processes, closing the possibility of debating policy at the legislative level. In September 2022, following a months-long electoral process, the MAS majority in the parliament secured the election of their preferred candidate for ombudsman after calling an impromptu vote while several opposition legislators were absent, sparking further criticism from the opposition about MAS legislators' use of their parliamentary majority.

Historically, powerful social movements have been able to exert pressure on the ALP to prevent the adoption of policies seen as detrimental to their interests. In late 2022, unionized and cooperative miners demanded that the government repeal a decree issued in August 2022, which states that the "resources" of public and majority state-owned companies would be transferred "to the General Treasury of the Nation (TGN) to finance investment projects and/or programs of social interest." In October, following months of protests and talks with mining representatives, the government agreed to repeal certain articles of the decree.

Anticorruption laws are poorly enforced, and corruption affects a range of government entities and economic sectors, including law enforcement bodies and extractive industries. Public procurement processes are frequently compromised by bribery.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Bolivia has no law guaranteeing access to public information. Elected officials by law must make asset declarations, but these are unavailable to the public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 39 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

While the constitution guarantees freedom of expression, in practice, journalists encounter harassment in connection with critical or investigative reporting. Media outlets critical of the government faced harassment from administration officials during the Morales and Áñez presidencies. Similar harassment has continued under the Arce administration, which has characterized journalists as liars and independent media outlets as partisan actors.

During 2022, members of the press faced attacks and harassment, including from protesters while reporting on demonstrations and from government officials, who denied journalists access to official information, particularly in relation to corruption scandals. In August, the National Association of Bolivian Journalists (ANPB) declared a "state of emergency" in the Bolivian press due to the "intimidation" and "judicial and political persecution" of the media.

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the constitution and generally upheld in practice. The 2009 constitution ended the Roman Catholic Church's official status, and created a secular state.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is legally guaranteed and upheld in practice.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is robust and generally free from interference or surveillance.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Bolivian law protects the right to peaceful assembly. However, many past protests have been marred by clashes between demonstrators and police, as well as physical confrontations between protesters and counterprotesters.

Widespread protests during the 2019 elections were characterized by high levels of violence among protesters, counterprotesters, and security forces. A report issued in August 2021 by the Interdisciplinary Group of Experts (GIEI), commissioned through an agreement between the IACHR and the Bolivian government, found that during the protests that led to Morales's resignation, his administration facilitated the transport of its supporters and provided them with materials and weapons to use against the opposition, causing grave human rights violations. The IACHR and the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) further investigated police use of excessive force during the 2019 postelectoral unrest, reporting that the police forces had committed serious human rights violations.

Large protests against the Arce government's decision to delay the national census until 2024 were held in October and November 2022 in the Santa Cruz region, led by opposition leader Luis Camacho. The protests featured occasional violent clashes between police and protesters, but were called off when opposition groups and the Arce administration reached a consensus on a new census date. Violent protests in Santa Cruz resumed in December, following Camacho's arrest on charges of terrorism for his role in the 2019 protests against Morales.

Other protests during the year included demonstrations by coca growers from Yungas, who accused the government of attempting to weaken their organization in favor of coca growers from the Chapare region, who are allied with the ruling party. These protests were met with high levels of repression by security forces, and according to the OHCHR, demonstrators were subjected to violence and "excessive use of force" by the police.

Many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate but are subject to some legal restrictions. In 2016, the TCP dismissed a petition arguing that two statutes in the country's NGO laws gave the government license to dissolve NGOs. Government officials from all political affiliations have at times smeared rights groups as political conspirators.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Labor and peasant unions are an active force wielding significant political influence.

The country's official labor code is inconsistent with Bolivian law; for example, it prohibits public sector unions, yet many public sector workers are able to legally unionize. A National Labor Court hears cases of antiunion discrimination, but tends to hand down verdicts slowly, and penalties for antiunion discrimination are not consistently applied.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Bolivia stands as the sole country that appoints justices via popular elections. However, judges on the Supreme Court (TSJ), the TCP, and other entities are first nominated through a two-thirds vote in the legislature. For years, this allowed MAS to dominate the candidate selection process, producing a lenient judiciary. The popular election of judges has politicized and factionalized appointments, creating further opportunities for corruption. In October 2022, the head of the Council of Magistrates, the body in charge of regulating the judiciary, resigned after acknowledging that he had collaborated with legislators from the ruling party to confirm the nomination of several judges. In addition to its politicization, the judiciary remains overburdened.

The use of the judiciary to prosecute opposition leaders was a common practice during the Morales administration and continued under interim president Áñez's government, which pressured prosecutors to pursue criminal cases against hundreds of individuals associated with the Morales administration. An arrest warrant for Morales, issued in December 2019, was annulled following the MAS victory in the October 2020 elections. In October 2020, the outgoing legislature approved the indictment of 11 ministers from the interim government, and recommended that interim president Áñez be prosecuted for her role in worsening the election-related violence in 2019. Áñez was arrested on multiple charges in March 2021, including conspiracy, sedition, and terrorism; she remained in preventive detention until June 2022, when she was brought to trial. Áñez was convicted of illegally assuming the presidency in 2019 and sentenced to ten years in prison. The Arce administration has also accused several opposition leaders elected in the March 2021 local elections, including Camacho, of terrorism, conspiracy, and sedition. New charges were brought against Camacho and other civic leaders following antigovernment protests in Santa Cruz in late 2022, including charges of sedition, conspiracy, and terrorism. Camacho was arrested in December on terrorism charges and remained in pretrial detention at year's end.

The August 2021 GIEI report on the 2019 political crisis found that a lack of independence, transparency, and objectivity in the exercise of criminal prosecutions—often used against political opponents—constitutes a structural and endemic problem of the Bolivian judiciary.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Many people have difficulty accessing the justice system because they lack resources to travel to courts and other relevant offices. In criminal matters, people accused of committing crimes can go years before they have a formal trial; interim president Áñez, who was arrested in March 2021, remained in preventive detention for more than a year before her June 2022 trial. Police are poorly paid and receive inadequate training, and corruption within the police force remains a problem.

In September 2022, a preliminary IACHR report revealed that in 2009, while Morales was president, Bolivian security forces detained, tortured, and extrajudicially executed at least three people who allegedly belonged to a terrorist cell that was supporting a separatist movement in the region of Santa Cruz. Others accused of involvement in the movement were illegally held in preventive detention for up to ten years. The 2022 report found the Bolivian government responsible for the human rights abuses stemming from this incident.

Morales supporters and opponents fought violently in several cities following the 2019 elections and Morales's resignation. Both sympathizers and detractors of Morales had access to explosives, including dynamite, homemade rocket launchers, and Molotov cocktails, and used them against each other and the security forces. The houses of journalists and activists from both sides were burnt, as were a number of public buses in La Paz. A political dialogue backed by the EU, the United Nations, and the Episcopal Conference, among others, allowed the violence to decrease before reaching the point of civil war or insurgency.

The 2010 antiracism law contains measures to combat discrimination and impose criminal penalties for discriminatory acts. However, racism and associated discrimination is common in the country, especially against Indigenous groups.

Bolivia has laws in place that prohibit discrimination against LGBT+ people. However, these laws are rarely enforced, and LGBT+ people experience widespread societal discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

There are no formal limits on people's ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education, but choices can be limited by socioeconomic difficulties. Roads are occasionally blockaded as part of protest actions, impeding free movement.

Women enjoy the same formal rights to property ownership as men, but discrimination is common, leading to disparities in property ownership and access to resources.

The rights of Indigenous people to prior consultation in cases of natural resource extraction and land development are not fully upheld by law or in practice.

The constitution reserves marriage as a bond between a man and a woman, and makes no provision for same-sex civil unions. However, in July 2020, the Second Constitutional Chamber of the La Paz Department Tribunal overturned a decision of the civil registry office denying a same-sex couple registration of their civil union, which was later officially approved.

Gender-based violence is a serious problem, and laws criminalizing violence against women are not well enforced. A new law increasing the criminal penalties for those convicted of rape, infanticide, and femicide was enacted in July 2022. Bolivia registered more than 90 femicides in 2022. Many women lack access to birth control and reproductive health care.

Bolivia is a source country for the trafficking of men, women, and children for forced labor and prostitution, and the country faced international criticism over permissive legislation regarding child labor in 2018, when the country changed the minimum working age to 14 years old.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

Population: 3,400,000
Capital: Sarajevo
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) is a highly decentralized parliamentary republic whose complex constitutional regime is embedded in the Dayton Peace Agreement, which ended the 1992–95 Bosnian War. Political affairs are characterized by severe partisan gridlock among nationalist leaders from the country's Bosniak, Serb, and Croat communities. Political participation by citizens from other communities is extremely limited. Corruption remains a serious problem in the government and elsewhere in society.

- Monitors deemed October's general elections competitive, but noted media bias and electoral irregularities, and expressed concern that increasing ethnic segregation in the country continued to have negative implications for Bosnian democracy. Reformist candidates posted modest gains.
- Less than an hour after polls closed, the internationally appointed High Representative Christian Schmidt used the executive "Bonn powers" to amend the electoral law of the Federation, one of the two entities comprising Bosnia and Herzegovina. Schmidt said the move was meant to increase "functionality" in the entity's governance, but the move sidestepped the newly elected parliament, and critics said it disproportionally benefitted the nationalist Croatian Democratic Union (HDZ BiH).
- In December, BiH was awarded European Union (EU) candidate status by the European Council. The move was widely seen as a geopolitical development, rather than one reflecting democratic reform in the country.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 18 / 40 (–1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 5 / 12 (–1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The 1995 Dayton Accords that ended the war in BiH reorganized the state as including two autonomous entities—the Federation of BiH, whose residents are mainly Bosniak and Croat, and the Serb-dominated Republika Srpska (RS)—that operate under a weak central government. The position of head of state is held by a three-member presidency comprising one Bosniak, one Serb, and one Croat; they are each elected to a four-year term, which they serve concurrently.

The chair of the Council of Ministers, or prime minister, is nominated by the presidency and approved by the House of Representatives. The chair in turn nominates other ministers for approval by the House.

In October 2022, BiH held general elections. Denis Bećirović of the Social Democratic Party (SDP) defeated longtime Bosniak nationalist chief Bakir Izetbegović of the Party of Democratic Action (SDA) for the Bosniak seat on the state presidency. Željko Komšić, leader of the multiethnic Democratic Front, defeated Borjana Krišto of the nationalist Croatian Democratic Union (HDZ BiH) for the Croat seat, but the HDZ BiH claimed his election was "illegitimate" on the grounds that Komšić's support came in part from Bosniak voters, as in the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina voters may choose to vote for either the Bosniak or Croat representative. (Komšić drew overall support from moderate Bosniak and Croat voters, rather than those in the HDZ BiH's conservative strongholds.) The secessionist Alliance of Independent Social Democrats (SNSD) from the Serb-dominated RS entity won the Serb seat on the state presidency, although the party's leader, Milorad Dodik, opted not to seek reelection and instead ran for the presidency of the RS entity. Significant evidence of electoral fraud in RS elections prompted the Central Election Commission (CIK) to call for a recount of the entity's presidential race. Dodik won the recount and was declared the president in late October, but the discovery of illegally printed ballots as well the large number of invalid ballots raises serious questions about the integrity of the vote and of the overall democratic process in BiH.

An election-monitoring mission from the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) assessed the polls as competitive but noted deficiencies in electoral framework, general distrust in government, unequal participation by women, concerns about the secrecy of votes, procedural irregularities during vote counting, and "limited and biased media coverage." The mission noted that deepening ethnic segregation and "corresponding divergent views on the future of the country remain a concern for the functioning of democratic institutions."

The Parliamentary Assembly, a state-level body, has two chambers. The 15-seat upper house, the House of Peoples, consists of five members from each of the three main ethnic groups, elected by the Federation and RS legislatures for four-year terms. The lower house, the House of Representatives, has 42 popularly elected members serving four-year terms, with 28 seats assigned to representatives from the Federation and 14 to representatives from the RS.

While the SDA, HDZ BiH, and SNSD dominated the October 2022 general elections, they faced significant competition from other parties, particularly the SDP. Polling took place concurrently with the presidential poll, and election monitors noted similar irregularities. Turnout was down 3 percent from the previous elections, to just above 50 percent.

Less than an hour after polls closed, the High Representative, Christian Schmidt, moved to amend the Federation entity's election law and constitution. While Schmidt said he intended to streamline government functionality and respect a Bosnian Constitutional Court ruling, he imposed the changes without offering an opportunity to the new entity parliament (in which moderate and reform-minded actors had increased their representation) to exercise its legislative powers to realize the relevant changes. Critics credibly alleged that Schmidt undermined the democratic integrity of BiH institutions; passed changes that appear to disproportionately favor the Croat nationalist HDZ BiH; and failed to adequately address the totality of the outstanding constitutional and electoral cases facing the Bosnian state.

The CIK administers elections with the help of municipal election commissions. Both are subject to significant political party interference. The CIK is a largely ineffectual body, unable to act decisively without political support.

Conflicts over fair ethnic representation surround aspects of the constitution and electoral laws. BiH citizens who do not identify as members of the country's Bosniak, Serb, or Croat "constitutive peoples" remain barred from the presidency and membership in the House of Peoples, despite 2009 and 2016 rulings by the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) that the exclusion of members of other ethnic groups violated the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

In July 2022, media reports emerged that High Representative Schmidt was going to amend the Federation entity's election laws. After criticism and protests, Schmidt made only technical amendments. Those interventions, and the more substantial amendments he made in October, were presented primarily as streamlining government functionality in the Federation entity. The decision, however, was widely understood and implicitly acknowledged by the Office of the High Representative (OHR) itself as a way of implementing a Constitutional Court decision in the so-called Ljubić case, regarding participation by the three main ethnic groups in certain political races. The move sidestepped the newly elected parliament and was widely perceived as benefitting the HDZ BiH. Despite his claims, Schmidt's changes have not led to prompt government formation in either the Federation entity or at the state level.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because abrupt changes to electoral laws by the OHR disrupted democratic processes in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties typically organize and operate freely, though the political arena in the Federation is generally limited to Bosniaks and Croats, while Serbs control politics in the RS. Coalitions at all levels of government shift frequently, but incumbent parties have tended to maintain their positions with the help of vast patronage networks, making it difficult for smaller reform-oriented groupings to achieve meaningful gains. The OHR's 2022 election law amendments significantly strengthened the position of the HDZ BiH in the Federation House of Peoples.

While there are no explicit legal barriers preventing opposition parties from entering government, expansive veto powers granted to the constitutive peoples and their representatives have helped the dominant nationalist parties to manipulate the system and shut out reformist or multiethnic challengers. However, the decisive victory of Bećirović over Izetbegović in the October 2022 state presidency race was seen as a major victory for reformist actors.

In addition to domestic problems like the politicization of public resources and the influence of corrupt patronage networks, the governments of Serbia and Croatia exert leverage in Bosnian politics through their respective local allies, the SNSD and the HDZ BiH. The Russian and Turkish governments have also offered support to preferred parties and candidates. There are credible reports that the government of Croatia has intensively lobbied the OHR, especially with respect to Schmidt's 2022 changes to the electoral code of the Federation entity. (Croatian officials have publicly boasted of their regular but "discreet" communications with Schmidt, additionally.) In July 2022, local media reported that the Croatian foreign minister had helped directly prepare the OHR's election law amendments.

Political rights in BiH are in large part contingent on one's ethnic background and place of residence. Jews and Roma are constitutionally barred from the presidency and from membership in the House of Peoples, despite the ECtHR rulings against those provisions. Serbs who live in the Federation and Croats and Bosniaks who live in the RS are also excluded from the presidency. Some Croats argue that their rights to representation are violated by electoral laws allowing non-Croats a significant voice in the selection of the Croat member of the presidency and Croat members of the House of Peoples. Critics of the Croat nationalist HDZ BiH, however, counter that the party has manipulated the discourse surrounding this issue to obstruct civic and liberal reforms of the country's constitutional order.

Women are underrepresented in politics and government. As a result, debates pertaining to maternal health and domestic violence are rarely at the center of parliamentary discussion, although they are openly, if infrequently, discussed in the media. LGBT+ people are marginalized in formal political life, but LGBT+ rights groups are active in the civic sphere.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

Government formation and policy implementation are seriously impeded by the country's complex system of ethnic representation. Under the Dayton Accords, representatives from each of the three major ethnic groups, at both the state and entity levels, may exercise a veto on legislation deemed harmful to their interests. The state government is also undercut by movements within each of BiH's entities for greater autonomy.

Dodik, now the RS president, maintains expansive control over the entity, and continues to speak openly of his desire for the RS to secede from BiH. In October 2021, he announced the RS's withdrawal from various federal institutions, notably the military, prompting fears of a secession crisis. The move came largely in response to the OHR's July 2021 law against genocide denial and was the latest in a series of escalating efforts to chip away at the functionality of the BiH state. Dodik continued to engage in secessionist rhetoric throughout 2022, prompting additional rounds of sanctions against him and his associates by the United States and United Kingdom.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains widespread and systemic, and legislation designed to combat the problem is poorly enforced. When corruption probes are actually opened, they rarely result in convictions.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations remain largely inaccessible to the public. Procurement awards are often made in secret, and public institutions frequently fail to comply with freedom of information laws. Candidates for major offices are obliged to make financial disclosures, but the relevant laws are weak, and the resulting disclosures are widely considered unreliable. Debate and decisions on matters of public interest, including legislation and subjects pertaining to EU accession, routinely occur during interparty negotiations that take place behind closed doors, outside of government institutions.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 34 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedom of expression is legally guaranteed but limited in practice. Journalists face political pressure as well as harassment, threats, and occasional assaults in the course of their work. There is a large private media sector, including outlets that are affiliated with local political parties and those that belong to major international news networks. Public broadcasters in both entities, and at the canton level, often operate as partisan platforms; this is especially pronounced with the entity broadcaster in the RS, Radio-Television Republika Srpska (RTRS), whose coverage serves the interests of the SNSD.

On a number of occasions during 2022, High Representative Schmidt reacted aggressively to pointed questions by journalists.

Religious freedom is not subject to formal restrictions, but in practice religious communities face some discrimination in areas where they constitute a minority. Acts of vandalism against religious sites continue to be reported.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

The education system is racked by corruption and clientelism, and the curriculum is politicized at all levels of education. At some schools in the Federation, Bosniak and Croat students are still divided into separate classes. Some Bosniak returnees in the RS have sent their children to temporary alternative schools to avoid curriculums they find discriminatory, and some Serb families have described discriminatory educational environments in the Federation.

Freedom of expression for individuals is generally protected from overt government interference. However, peer pressure and the risk of an adverse public reaction remain significant curbs on the discussion of sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected in BiH, and peaceful protests are common. However, demonstrators sometimes encounter administrative obstacles or police violence, and organizers can become targets of police or political harassment. In June 2022, Sarajevo successfully held a pride parade for the fourth year in a row, unmarred by violence or harassment of participants. A small counterdemonstration by religious conservatives was kept far away from the main proceedings by local police.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The nongovernmental organization (NGO) sector in BiH remains robust but is sometimes exposed to government pressure and interference, with conditions more difficult in the RS.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Labor unions operate freely in the whole of BiH, although workers often have limited bargaining power in practice. The right to strike is legally protected, but labor laws in the Federation pose significant barriers to the exercise of this right. Legal protections against antiunion action by employers are weakly enforced. The leading political blocs in the country exercise significant control over unions in their respective strongholds.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is formally independent but weak in practice. Dozens of Constitutional Court decisions have been disregarded by political leaders, as has some jurisprudence from the ECtHR. Individual judges are also subject to political pressure, interference, and intimidation regarding the cases before them. The High Judicial and Prosecutorial Council of Bosnia and Herzegovina (HJPC), which appoints judges, has been racked by scandals and is widely perceived as corrupt. The HJPC was among the state institutions from which the RS intended to withdraw, according to Dodik's October 2021 announcement.

The existence of four separate court systems—for BiH, the RS, the Federation, and the self-governing Brčko District—contributes to overall inefficiency.

Successive rounds of US sanctions in 2022 targeted, among other things, criminal elements within the Bosnian prosecutor's chamber and individuals involved in the refusal of the Croat nationalist HDZ BiH to appoint judges to the Federation's Constitutional Court.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Guarantees of due process are inconsistently upheld, with judges often failing to manage trials effectively and contributing to extensive delays. Access to adequate legal counsel can be contingent on one's financial standing. Police corruption is a problem and sometimes stems from links to organized crime. Public prosecutors are widely reputed to be corrupt and under political control.

The process of prosecuting war crimes in domestic courts has been slow, with political interference and courts' lack of resources and capacity exacerbating a large backlog of cases.

Despite efforts to reinvigorate the process, impunity for war crimes including killings and sexual violence has persisted.

In September 2021, the HJPC removed the country's chief prosecutor, Gordana Tadić, from her post for negligence. She was accused of working to shield individuals presumed to be under the protection of the HDZ BiH from prosecution. US sanctions in 2022 have continued to home in on state prosecutors.

Although overall violent crime rates are low, organized crime is a significant problem, and high-profile incidents in recent years have fueled public frustration with the police and judicial system. Members of vulnerable groups are subject to harassment by police, including migrants transiting through the country. Many prisons are overcrowded or feature other substandard conditions, and detainees face physical abuse by prison authorities. Active land mines dating to the 1990s continue to pose a threat to civilians in rural parts of the country.

Laws guaranteeing equal treatment are unevenly upheld. Discrimination against members of the Romany minority is widespread. People who returned to their homes after being displaced during the war face discrimination in employment and housing in regions where their ethnic group constitutes a minority; Bosniak returnees in the RS face notable discrimination and harassment. Bosniaks and Croats in the RS more generally experience difficulties in accessing social services. Women are legally entitled to full equality with men but encounter discrimination in the workplace in practice. Members of the LGBT+ community face discrimination, harassment, and occasional physical attacks, and authorities often fail to adequately investigate and prosecute crimes against LGBT+ people.

Tens of thousands of migrants, refugees, and asylum seekers have arrived in the country each year since 2018. While the vast majority travel on to other locations, thousands remain stranded in BiH, most of whom live in squalid camps that lack basic services or protection against the elements. Authorities in the RS have refused to allow any migrant centers, and the burden of care has been thrust almost entirely on a handful of municipalities in the country's northwest.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The law protects freedom of movement, though there are minor barriers to the exercise of this right—for example, taxis will generally not take passengers across the border between the two entities. Bureaucratic hurdles make registering new domiciles a tedious and lengthy process. Land mines limit movement in some areas.

Although the legal framework broadly supports property rights and private business activity, widespread corruption and patronage remain major barriers to free enterprise. Individuals who returned to their homes after being displaced by the 1992–95 war have faced attacks on their property. The European Commission has called for further progress on compensating people for property that cannot be returned.

Individual freedoms on personal status matters such as marriage and divorce are generally protected. Same-sex marriage is not recognized, though in 2020 the Federation government appointed a working group to consider ways to acknowledge such partnerships.

Domestic violence is considerably underreported, and civic groups have found that law enforcement authorities are often reluctant to intervene or impose strong penalties.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Legal protections against exploitative working conditions are poorly enforced. Patronage and clientelism continue to adversely affect hiring practices and contribute to de facto restrictions on economic opportunity.

While human trafficking remains a problem, the US State Department in 2022 noted an increase in antitrafficking efforts, including identifying, prosecuting, and convicting traffickers.

Botswana

Population: 2,600,000
Capital: Gaborone
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: While it is considered one of the most stable democracies in Africa, Botswana has been dominated by a single party since independence, and many institutions answer to the office of the president. Media freedom is threatened by hostile lawsuits against journalists and attempts by the government to introduce closer oversight of the press corps. The Indigenous San people, as well as migrants, refugees, and LGBT+ people, face discrimination.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- President Mokgweetsi Masisi held a historic meeting in January with representatives of the country's leading LGBT+ rights organization, Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals of Botswana (LEGABIBO). At the meeting, he promised to respect the 2019 decriminalization of same-sex relations.
- In September, the Presidential Commission of Inquiry into the Review of the Constitution of Botswana presented its report to the president. President Masisi stood accused of employing a top-down, nonparticipatory, and nontransparent approach to constitutional reform.
- In September, the Law Society of Botswana (LSB) asked Chief Justice Terrence Rannowane to resign following allegations that, together with the minister for state president, he tried to influence a judge in a case against lawmaker and former cabinet member Thapelo Matsheka. LSB also accused him of manipulating the allocation of high-profile cases that the executive had a vested interest in.
- In July, Parliament passed the Media Practitioners' Association Bill. Journalists expressed concern about the bill's creation of a formal register for journalists and media enterprises. Earlier in the year the government had attempted, but failed, to push through a bill that contained provisions for warrantless surveillance; journalists had expressed alarm about potential introduction of the practice.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 28 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is indirectly elected by the National Assembly for a five-year term and is eligible for reelection to a second term. The vice president is appointed by the president and confirmed by the National Assembly. The president holds significant power, including the authority to prolong or dismiss the National Assembly. In 2018, Vice President Mokgweetsi Masisi was named interim president when the term of his predecessor, Ian Khama, expired. He was then sworn into office that November, after the Botswana Democratic Party (BDP) won a majority of parliamentary seats in the October 2019 elections.

Parliament includes a unicameral, 65-seat National Assembly and an advisory House of Chiefs. Voters directly elect 57 National Assembly members to five-year terms, while 6 members are nominated by the president and approved by the National Assembly. The president and attorney general are ex officio members. The 35-member House of Chiefs (Ntlo ya Dikgosi) is composed mostly of traditional leaders, representatives they elect, and representatives appointed by the president. It advises legislators on tribal issues, land matters, and the constitution. In August 2022, Parliament passed the Constitution Amendment Bill, which will increase by four the number of elected members of Parliament from 57 to 61.

The BDP won 38 National Assembly seats with 52.7 percent of the vote in the October 2019 elections, while the Umbrella for Democratic Change (UDC) won 15 seats and 35.9 percent, the Botswana Patriotic Front (BPF) won 3 seats and 4.4 percent, and the Alliance of Progressives (AP) won 1 seat and 5.1 percent.

Southern African Development Community (SADC) and African Union (AU) observers called the poll free and fair but criticized the lack of indelible ink and the use of translucent ballot boxes. The UDC claimed that voters were allowed to cast multiple ballots, and that voters and election officials were bribed. The UDC petitioned the High Court to throw the results out, but their case was dismissed in December 2019. The Court of Appeal agreed to hear the matter in January 2020, but dismissed it later that month, citing a lack of jurisdiction.

The Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) administers elections and is generally considered independent and capable. However, the IEC was affected by budgetary constraints and a staff shortage during the 2019 electoral period, impacting its voter-education and registration drives. There have been calls for the IEC to be removed from the mandate of the Office of the President to allow it greater independence.

In September, the Presidential Commission of Inquiry into the Review of the Constitution of Botswana presented its report to the president. President Masisi stood accused of employing a top-down, nonparticipatory, and nontransparent approach to constitutional reform.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

The right of political parties to form and operate is legally guaranteed and is respected in practice. However, the opposition has alleged that the BDP abuses state resources, including the influential state media, to its own benefit. The lack of a public-financing system also leaves opposition parties at a disadvantage. The 2018 withdrawal of a provision that had increased candidates' fees brought some relief to opposition parties. There were calls in 2022 during consultations on constitutional reform for laws to further regulate political-party funding.

The UDC and its leader, Duma Boko, reported harassment and interference from government agencies during the 2019 election campaign, including the harassment of Boko's family members and the impounding of a light aircraft used by the UDC for campaigning. The Directorate of Intelligence and Security Services (DISS) has also been accused of harassing opposition parliamentarians.

In July 2020, amid concerns that BDP parliamentarians intended to join other parties, the government introduced a bill that would effectively prohibit local and national legislators from doing so. The law came into force in February 2021.

The BDP, drawing on the advantages of its long incumbency, has dominated the political landscape since 1966; no opposition party has ever won power.

Several attempted opposition coalitions since 2012 have failed to coalesce into a potent political force due to political infighting, mistrust, and the prevalence of personality-based leadership.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People's political choices are largely free from domination by unelected outside groups. While observers noted the potential for tribal chiefs to influence voters, a 2020 Afrobarometer survey showed that most respondents did not see chiefs as influential.

Election monitors noted that Batswana political parties rely on foreign donations, which could allow for external interference in domestic politics.

In August 2022, a lawmaker introduced a motion requesting that Parliament ban external funding of elections.

There have been reports of vote buying during elections.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women have full political rights, but cultural factors and resource constraints limit their participation, and their interests are not necessarily addressed by elected leaders. Only 11 female candidates ran for legislative seats in 2019, a decline from the 17 who participated in 2014. Seven women currently sit in the National Assembly. The SADC Gender and Development Monitor 2022, published in August, reported that Botswana was among the worst performers among South African Development Community (SADC) countries as far as women's representation in national assemblies.

Smaller ethnic and tribal groups tend to be left out of the political process, with observers noting that members are disadvantaged by the country's first-past-the-post electoral system. People with disabilities have participated at low levels in recent parliamentary elections. Parties generally do not represent the interests of LGBT+ people.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials determine government policies. However, opposition parties have criticized the executive for its influence over Parliament, and for rushing legislation without adequate deliberation or consultation.

President Masisi was criticized for single-handedly initiating a 2022 constitutional review process without seeking input from important stakeholders, including Parliament.

In July 2022 Parliament passed a bill establishing a standing committee on the remuneration of elected representatives, members of the House of Chiefs, and some other specified offices. The inclusion of ministerial appointees with voting rights in the committee was criticized by some lawmakers for fear that that would undermine the committee's independence.

In 2016, lawmakers approved an amendment increasing the number of National Assembly members appointed by the president from four to six. Opposition leaders argued that the change would strengthen executive power at the legislature's expense.

In 2018, Masisi transferred the DISS and the Financial Intelligence Agency from their respective ministries to the president's office, prompting concerns over the improper centralization of power.

Botswana has a comprehensive legislative anticorruption framework. Whistleblower-protection legislation was passed in 2016. In 2019, legislators passed the Declaration of Assets and Liabilities Act (DALA), and an Ethics and Integrity Directorate became operational in January 2020. However, anticorruption operations are constrained by a lack of funding.

The main anticorruption agency, the Directorate on Corruption and Economic Crime (DCEC) has been accused of ineffectiveness in pursuing high-level cases, and its independence has been questioned since it was transferred to the president's office in 2012. In July, Parliament dismissed a legislative move, backed by civil society groups, to make the DCEC independent.

The DCEC is prone to leadership instability and has had a high turnover of directors general. In June 2022, Director General Tymon Katlholo was suspended from office, a move some perceived as political interference in its work. In an appearance before a parliamentary committee that month, Katlholo said the DCEC had 215 cases with prosecuting authorities, 140 cases before the courts, and a backlog of 619 active investigations.

Botswana lacks a freedom-of-information law, which limits government transparency. Budget processes are opaque and public contracts are often awarded through patronage networks. Section 44 of the Corruption and Economic Crime Act prohibits publishing information on DCEC investigations.

Public officers and the heads of private organizations are subject to DALA. A new Procurement Act, which decentralized public procurement, came into effect in 2022 and is aimed at addressing corruption and strengthening transparency and accountability. In March 2022, Botswana committed itself to a tax transparency agenda by endorsing the Yaoundé Declaration. Authorities have also published clear information on the emergency use of COVID-19 funds.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 44 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed. However, there were legislative developments during 2022 that caused concern among media workers and press freedom advocates.

In a move that prompted alarm among journalists, the government attempted, but ultimately failed, to include provisions for warrantless surveillance in the 2022 Criminal Procedure and Evidence (Controlled Investigations) Bill, which Parliament enacted in February. In July, Parliament passed the Media Practitioners' Association Bill. Although viewed as a significant improvement over the draconian 2008 Media Practitioners Act, journalists expressed concerns over about the creation of a formal register for journalists and media enterprises.

State-run media outlets dominate the broadcasting sector and have exhibited progovernment bias. A government ban on private-media advertising remains in place, harming the competitiveness and viability of many outlets. Journalistic activity is also affected by provisions of the National Security Law, DALA, and the DISS Act, as well as the use of strategic lawsuits against public participation (SLAPPs) by the rich and powerful to suppress critical press.

Religious freedom is generally respected, though all religious organizations must register with the government.

Although academic freedom is generally respected, professors often practice self-censorship when addressing sensitive topics. Foreign academics have previously been deported for publishing work that criticized the government, contributing to cautiousness among many scholars.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally protected but at times restricted in practice, prompting self-censorship among Batswana. Insulting the president, a lawmaker, or a public official is punishable by a fine. The 2008 Public Service Act restricts the ability of public-sector workers to air political views. The DISS has some capacity to monitor private online communications. In October 2021, the UN Human Rights Committee expressed concern over an increase in the "scale and scope" of intrusive surveillance methods used against Batswana by the authorities in recent years. The government's failed attempt to introduce warrantless surveillance provisions into the Criminal Procedure and Evidence (Controlled Investigations) Act 2022 heightened concerns about the government's perception of free-expression rights.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and largely upheld in practice. However, the Public Order Act requires citizens to seek police permission to hold demonstrations.

The constitutionality of this clause has been questioned in the past, and police have sometimes denied requests for unclear reasons. In April 2022, the Women in Politics movement reported that it had been refused permission by the office of the presidency to march to the office's grounds and present a petition expressing concern about gender-based violence.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), including human rights groups, generally operate without restriction.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The right to form a union is respected, but the Trade Dispute Act places restrictions on who can strike. As a result, the government declares many strikes illegal, putting employees' jobs at risk. The law does not always protect workers from antiunion discrimination by employers and other unfair employment practices in the workplace. In December 2022, Botswana committed itself to upkeeping an effective system of labor inspections by ratifying two International Labor Organization (ILO) labor inspection conventions.

In May 2022 President Masisi reiterated an unfulfilled promise from 2018 to revive the dormant Public Service Bargaining Council (PSBC), but had failed to do so by year's end.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent and free from interference. Judges have ruled against the government in several high-profile cases in recent years.

The year 2022 saw a number of organizations, including the Law Society of Botswana (LSB), condemn several acts involving the chief justice. The LSB accused the chief justice of manipulating the allocation of cases involving high-profile disputes in which the executive has a vested interest. The attorney general registered similar concerns. In September, the LSB called for the immediate resignation of the chief justice following accusations that, working together with Minister for State President Kabo Morwaeng, he tried to influence a judge in the a case against parliament member and former cabinet minister Thapelo Matsheka. The chief justice denied interfering.

Calls to improve the transparency, impartiality, and public oversight of the selection and appointment processes for judges persist. While the Judicial Service Commission (JSC) advertises vacancies and interviews potential members of the High Court, the appointment process for Court of Appeal judges is relatively nontransparent.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The right to a fair trial is constitutionally protected and generally upheld in practice. However, the judiciary lacks human and financial resources, leading to case backlogs, lengthy pretrial detentions, and the postponement of cases. In February 2022, the chair of the LSB called out a lack of disciplinary actions against judges who failed to deliver timely judgments. Among other things he pointed to the case of a judge who retired without delivering more than 100 pending judgments. A directive was issued to restart the cases at the expense of litigants.

In August 2022, Justice Gaolapelwe Ketlogetswe lambasted the government for detaining Matsheka without a warrant or charge for more than the legally permitted 48 hours.

Attorneys are provided to defendants in capital cases, but defendants in noncapital cases must pay for their own counsel. The UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention observed during its July 2022 visit that legal aid was only available in civil proceedings and capital cases. It also raised concern about the automatic and often indefinite detention of irregular migrants. The DISS can arrest suspects without a warrant if agents believe they have committed or will commit a crime.

Although citizens are largely protected from the illegitimate use of force, corporal punishment is sometimes imposed.

The law allows for capital punishment. During its July 2022 visit to the country, the UN Committee Against Torture noted inhumane treatment of people on death row. The state does not provide them or their families with details about the date and time of execution, and their bodies are not always given to their families for burial.

The DISS has historically been accused of corrupt activity, unlawful arrests, and extrajudicial killings. Instances of police brutality have been reported, and perpetrators are rarely held accountable. Botswana has no human rights body to investigate human rights abuses, but has conferred that function to the Office of the Ombudsman. The penal code does not define torture as a crime. In February 2022, the defense, justice, and security minister was criticized for instructing police at a police conference to "eliminate" suspected criminals.

Antipoaching operations have resulted in fatal incidents over the past two decades. In 2018, President Masisi ended an unwritten shoot-to-kill policy originally adopted in at least 2013 to deter wildlife poachers. The poaching ban was revoked altogether in 2019. In January 2022, an inquest found that soldiers who had killed four suspected poachers in November 2020 were not criminally liable.

Customary law, commonly applied in rural areas, often discriminates against women. The Indigenous San people tend to be economically marginalized and lack access to education and other public services. There have been reports of beatings, abuse, and arbitrary arrests of San by police and park rangers.

Same-sex relations were criminalized until 2019, when the High Court ruled that the ban was unconstitutional. The Court of Appeal upheld the ruling in November 2021. President Masisi promised to respect the ruling during a historic meeting January 2022 with representatives of the LGBT+ rights group LEGABIBO.

Refugees in Botswana have been detained in encampments and have been denied the ability to work and integrate into local communities.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

Most citizens can move freely throughout the country and travel internationally, though refugees and asylum seekers face movement restrictions. San people have limited access to their traditional lands in the Central Kalahari Game Reserve. The government's long-standing policy has been to relocate San out of the reserve, and those who still have relatives living there must apply for a permit to visit them. In December 2022, the Court of Appeal upheld a High Court decision denying an elderly San man the right to be buried in his ancestral land in the Central Kalahari Game Reserve. Tribal rights group Survival International has accused the government of ill-treating San people residing inside the reserve.

All COVID-19-related movement restrictions were lifted in 2022.

Botswana has generally sound legal protections for property rights, and these are generally enforced in practice. The country's regulatory framework is considered conducive to establishing and operating private businesses. Land rights for wives, widows, and orphans were improved in September 2020, when President Masisi signed amendments to the 2015 Land Policy into law. In May 2021, the High Court found the compulsory acquisition of tribal land to be unlawful in a ruling that the SALC praised as "vital" to protecting tribal land rights.

Gender-based violence, including domestic violence and rape, is pervasive. Spousal rape is not considered a crime. Customary law restricts women's rights within a marriage. When husbands and wives separate, custody of any children is traditionally granted to the father. Child and forced marriages still occur under customary law. Perpetrators are rarely prosecuted. Women can experience harassment for not dressing conservatively.

In 2018, Parliament passed the Penal Code Amendment Bill, which introduced stronger penalties for rape and raised the age of consent from 16 to 18. Subsequent amendments introduced longer sentences for rape and provide compensation for victims. Women's rights activists expressed concern over certain aspects of the reforms, including the criminalizing of false rape allegations. Other interventions include a sex offenders registry, a toll-free line for victims of gender-based violence, an interministerial committee on gender-based violence, and 25 courts dedicated to gender-based violence cases.

Same-sex relations have been decriminalized, but there is no legislation yet that legalizes same-sex unions.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Workers enjoy protections against exploitative labor practices. However, employer abuses in the retail, tourism, and private-security sectors are an ongoing problem. Botswana lacks a strong regulatory framework for labor brokers that dispatch workers to clients on short-term contracts, in which exploitation is common.

Human trafficking remains an ongoing challenge, although the government increased its efforts to combat it in 2022 compared to the previous year. Cooperation efforts with foreign governments improved, as well as the identification and referral of victims to care.

Forced and child labor, particularly on San cattle farms, remain challenges. No labor inspections were conducted in known problematic areas in 2022.

Brazil

Population: 214,800,000
Capital: Brasília
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Brazil is a democracy that holds competitive elections, and the political arena, though polarized, is characterized by vibrant public debate. However, independent journalists and civil society activists risk harassment and violent attack, political violence is high, and the government has struggled to address crime and disproportionate violence against and economic exclusion of minorities. Corruption is endemic at top levels, and governmental transparency has decreased, contributing to widespread disillusionment among the public. Societal discrimination and violence against LGBT+ people remain serious problems.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Former president Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of the Workers' Party (PT) won the second round of the presidential election in late October, narrowly defeating incumbent Jair Bolsonaro of the Liberal Party (PL). The PL became the largest single party in both houses of the National Congress in the concurrently held legislative polls. Parties aligned with the nonideological center, meanwhile, collectively represented the largest lower-house group.
- Outgoing president Bolsonaro, who claimed that the country's voting system was susceptible to fraud during the campaign, challenged the results in court in late November. The Superior Electoral Court (TSE) chief rejected the case, saying Bolsonaro's campaign acted in bad faith.
- The highly polarized campaign was marred by disinformation, aggressive rhetoric, harassment, and political violence. A federal police officer in Paraná State was accused of killing a PT official in July, while a worker in Mato Grosso State killed a PT supporter in September. In late December, a man was arrested for attempting to detonate a bomb near Brasília's airport, saying he was inspired by Bolsonaro.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 30 / 40 (−1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Brazil is a federal republic governed under a presidential system. The president is elected by popular vote for a four-year term and is eligible for reelection to a second consecutive term.

In the 2022 race, the candidates appealed to voters concerned with economic difficulties and rising poverty levels. Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of the PT, who served as president from 2003 to 2011, and incumbent Jair Bolsonaro of the PL were the two leading candidates. Lula campaigned on economic concerns and social policy, while Bolsonaro's campaign focused attention on evangelical support. The election was decided in a late October runoff, with Lula winning 50.9 percent of the vote and Bolsonaro earning 49.1 percent.

The highly polarized campaign was marred by disinformation, aggressive rhetoric on social networks and online messaging services and political violence. Bolsonaro also said the country's voting system was susceptible to fraud during the contest. As the second round was held, federal highway agents reportedly conducted traffic stops in several states, stopping buses carrying voters to polling stations. Bolsonaro did not explicitly concede after losing the election, initially remaining silent while his supporters blocked major roads and called for new elections and military intervention. In late November, Bolsonaro challenged the results in court, calling for some runoff results to be "invalidated" after the TSE ratified the vote. TSE chief Alexandre de Moraes, who is also a Supreme Court justice, rejected the case, saying the campaign acted in bad faith. In late December, a man was arrested for attempting to detonate a bomb near Brasília's airport, telling police he was inspired by Bolsonaro's rhetoric. Lula was due to be sworn in on January 1, 2023.

Legislative elections are generally free and fair. The bicameral National Congress is composed of an 81-member Senate and a 513-member Chamber of Deputies. Senators serve staggered eight-year terms, with one- to two-thirds coming up for election every four years. Members of the Chamber of Deputies serve four-year terms.

In the October 2022 elections, the PL became the largest single party in the Chamber of Deputies with 99 seats, while the PT won 69. The Centrão ("Big Center"), an array of patronage-based parties without clear ideological positions that provided legislative support to Bolsonaro, became the largest force in the Chamber of Deputies; the five parties understood to make up the Centrão won a combined 231 seats. The PL became the largest party in the Senate.

Brazilians also voted for state-level governors and legislators in all 26 states and the Brasília Federal District, concurrently with the national contests. Parties affiliated with the Centrão performed well, with over half of Brazil's state-level representatives hailing from its parties. State-level campaigning took place in the same highly polarized environment as the presidential contest, marked by aggressive rhetoric and political violence.

Brazilian election laws are generally well enforced. The TSE presides over cases related to violations of electoral law.

While Brazilian voters have cast ballots electronically since 1996, Bolsonaro had proposed its replacement with a paper-receipt system via a constitutional amendment, which the Chamber of Deputies did not sustain in a 2021 vote. Bolsonaro again claimed that the country's ballot system was vulnerable to fraud ahead of the 2022 elections, though no evidence has ever been found. The Defense Ministry inspected several hundred voting machines in October; while it found no irregularities, it did not publish its report until November. The report did not explicitly declare whether potential fraud was possible.

In October 2022, the TSE gave de Moraes the unilateral authority to order the removal of online content that did not comply with previous TSE rulings, as part of an effort to combat disinformation. Bolsonaro supporters and legal experts criticized the move, fearing that it could allow for censorship. De Moraes cited the proliferation of false information and hate speech when initially proposing the move to the TSE.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16 (−1)

Brazil has an unfettered multiparty system marked by vigorous competition among rival parties. The electoral framework encourages the proliferation of parties, a number of which are based in a single state. Some parties display little ideological consistency. Lawmakers often switch parties, rendering electoral coalitions fragile. The executive branch must assemble diverse and often ideologically incoherent coalitions to pass legislation due to the large number of parties. Political parties operate with little transparency and under no governance rules, and often are targets of investigations into the misuse of public funds.

Ahead of the 2022 elections, 32 parties were registered, 23 of which won seats in the Chamber of Deputies. In 2018, 30 parties won lower-house seats.

Opposition parties are able to compete and gain power through elections at both the federal and subnational levels. In the 2022 elections, the PL and the PT both gained significant levels of support. However, the Bolsonaro administration used public programs to bolster its campaign, reducing the opposition's power to compete freely. The government increased the size of Auxílio Brasil (Brazil Aid) welfare payments between August and December 2022. In September, the government published rules on loans for Auxílio Brasil recipients. In October, it made 480,000 extra households eligible for Auxílio Brasil support.

Powerful business interests undermine democratic accountability by facilitating or encouraging corruption among elected officials. Criminal groups have carried out attacks against political candidates.

Brazilian voters face high levels of political violence, which increased by 400 percent between 2018 and 2022 according to an October survey conducted by two nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). In July, a federal police officer in Paraná State was accused of murdering a local PT official, voicing support for Bolsonaro as he did so. In September, a worker in Mato Grosso State, who also supported Bolsonaro, admitted to killing a PT supporter and claimed self-defense. In an August survey, almost 70 percent of Brazilian respondents feared threats and harassment for their political views and 3.2 percent said they were victimized for their political views within 30 days of participating. In October, the Labor Ministry reported receiving 173 claims of electoral harassment—where employers promised benefits to or otherwise threatened employees depending on who they voted for—ahead of the elections.

Militias and other criminal organizations—which may exercise significant control over campaigning and other political activity within their territories—have been blamed for a rise in violence in recent years.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because Brazilians were subjected to unprecedented levels of intimidation, threats, and physical violence during national- and state-level elections.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees equal rights without prejudice, but some groups have greater political representation than others, and there is great unevenness in exercising de facto political rights. Afro-Brazilians and women and their interests remain underrepresented in electoral politics and in government. In the 2022 election, women won 17.8 percent of Chamber of Deputies seats, a slight improvement over the 15 percent figure achieved in 2018. Afro-Brazilian representation also improved in 2022. In December, incoming president Lula announced a cabinet that featured more racial and gender diversity.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

Widespread corruption undermines the government's ability to make and implement policy without undue influence from private or criminal interests.

During the 2010s, the functioning of government was severely hampered by a rolling political crisis due to corruption scandals. Congressional leaders have gained political prominence during the Bolsonaro administration, which lacked a stable governing coalition. The National Congress and state governors helped fill a vacuum in responding to COVID-19, with many governors imposing stricter restrictions and objecting to Bolsonaro's management.

The presence of active-duty and retired military officials in the Bolsonaro administration, along with the expansion of military missions into areas like environmental protection and the pandemic response, prompted unease about the military's influence in politics. The Defense Ministry was additionally responsible for examining a number of voting machines during the 2022 elections.

Corruption and graft are endemic in Brazil, especially among elected officials. Between 2014 and 2021, an investigation known as Operation Car Wash focused on bribery, money laundering, and bid-rigging involving state oil company Petrobras and private construction companies.

However, a series of investigative reports known as the Car Wash Leaks, published by the Intercept Brasil in 2019, exposed an improper relationship between Sérgio Moro—a judge who later became a Bolsonaro-era justice minister and won a Senate seat in 2022—and federal prosecutors. The Supreme Court annulled the convictions in 2021 on procedural grounds. Lula, who was imprisoned over corruption allegations in 2018, was released in November 2019, while his convictions were among those that were later annulled. Moro himself resigned as justice minister in 2020, after Bolsonaro attempted to interfere with the federal police, one of the agencies tasked with investigating his family and associates.

Criminal inquiries have targeted multiple members of Bolsonaro's family. By early 2021, Bolsonaro and all four of his sons faced corruption investigations. In August 2022, the UOL news outlet reported that Bolsonaro family members traded 107 properties since 1990, with federal prosecutors examining transactions on 25 of them. None of the inquiries have advanced because of the veto power of the attorney general and Bolsonaro's presidential immunity.

In March 2022, Education Minister Milton Ribeiro resigned after two pastors allegedly bribed the ministry in order to direct funding to their municipalities. Riberio was arrested on corruption charges in June, along with a pastor tied to Bolsonaro.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Brazil enacted a Freedom of Information Act (LLI) in 2012, but the government does not always release requested information, and when doing so, not always in machine-readable formats. Compliance with the LLI also varies among the country's states and municipalities. In 2019, the Bolsonaro administration modified the LLI by decree, giving a larger group of officials the power to classify information as secret.

The Bolsonaro administration often decreed 100 years of secrecy on information it considered sensitive, including meetings with pastors, allegations against former health minister Eduardo Pazuello, and two of Bolsonaro's sons' visits to the presidential residence.

The Bolsonaro administration additionally used a "secret budget," an opaque system of financial grants that routed billions of reais through a rapporteur. Observers criticized the arrangement, which allowed lawmakers to receive added funding in exchange for backing the administration without transparency or oversight. In December 2022, the Supreme Court ruled the arrangement unconstitutional.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 42 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of expression and the country's media environment is vibrant. However, investigative journalists, particularly those who cover corruption and crime, face threats, harassment, obstruction, and sometimes deadly violence. The legal framework provides inadequate protection for freedom of expression. Defamation is subject to criminal penalties.

Journalists who criticize Bolsonaro face online and offline harassment, and outlets that carry such criticism face economic pressure from the government. Between August 16 and October 30, 2022, Reporters Without Borders (RSF) counted 2.9 million social media posts containing aggressive and offensive content against journalists. Most came from Bolsonaro supporters or Bolsonaro himself, who often posts aggressive content against journalists, especially women.

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, and the government generally respects this right in practice. However, Afro-Brazilian religious groups face considerable discrimination. Violence against Afro-Brazilian religious groups is frequent, especially in Rio de Janeiro's favelas. In recent years, Afro-Brazilian temples ("terreiros") have closed after assaults or threats from evangelical drug dealers, who claim territory and seek to repress faiths other than their own.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Education policy has become politicized under the Bolsonaro administration, with some professors and researchers seeking temporary refuge abroad following threats in Brazil. The administration placed persistent pressure on academia and scientific organizations, especially by reducing funds for science and education.

In September 2022, the Health Ministry blocked Deisy Ventura, a professor who criticized the Bolsonaro administration's COVID-19 response, from joining a World Health Organization technical committee.

People are generally able to express personal views in public without fear of institutional surveillance or retaliation. However, the 2018 and 2022 electoral periods were affected by the fear of political violence. Violent homophobic rhetoric contributes to a sense of fear among many that open discussion of LGBT+ rights and issues could be met with harassment or attack.

Social media intimidation and harassment by progovernment troll groups remains a serious problem in Brazil. Bolsonaro allies, including family members, have faced investigations over their involvement in disinformation campaigns.

Public servants are subject to social media monitoring and risk losing their positions if they criticize the government.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

While freedom of assembly is generally respected, police or other security agents sometimes use excessive force against demonstrations.

Pro- and anti-Bolsonaro protests were held nationwide on September 7, 2022, the country's independence day. While pro-Bolsonaro rallies held in 2021 were marred by clashes with authorities, events in 2022 were largely peaceful.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

NGOs operate freely in a variety of fields. However, activists working on land rights and environmental protection issues have faced harassment, threats, and violence in recent years, along with verbal hostility from Bolsonaro and other administration officials. In September 2022, Global Witness called Brazil the world's most dangerous country for environmental activists in the last decade, noting the deaths of 342 activists from 2012 to 2021. More than 85 percent of the killings happened in the Amazon.

In June 2022, British journalist Dominic "Dom" Phillips and activist Bruno Araújo Pereira, who was documenting the exploitation of the Amazon rainforest, went missing in Amazonas State; their bodies were discovered that month, when a fisherman confessed to killing them and directed authorities to their remains. In late July, prosecutors charged the fisherman and his brother along with a third man. Another individual suspected of involvement was bailed in October.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Industrial labor unions are well organized, and although they are politically connected, Brazilian unions tend to be freer from political party control than their counterparts in other Latin American countries. However, controversial labor reforms enacted in 2017 diminished the strength and role of unions in collective bargaining with businesses.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary, though largely independent in many parts of the country, is overburdened, inefficient, and often subject to intimidation and other external influences, especially in rural areas. Despite these shortcomings, the country's progressive constitution has resulted in an active judiciary that often rules in favor of citizens over the state.

The Supreme Court serves as an autonomous counterweight to the executive. Tensions remained high in 2022, with Bolsonaro frequently issuing threats against the court. Bolsonaro has maintained an adversarial stance towards Supreme Court justices, especially Alexandre de Moraes, who Bolsonaro accused of favoring Lula in a January 2022 comment. In October, Bolsonaro threatened to pack the Supreme Court with his appointees if reelected.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

The judiciary generally upholds the right to a fair trial. However, federal, state, and appellate courts are severely backlogged. Access to justice varies greatly due to income inequality, and the state struggles to provide legal counsel for defendants and prisoners who are unable to afford an attorney. Under a 2017 law, members of the armed forces and military police accused of certain serious crimes against civilians can be tried in military, rather than civilian, courts. In the vast majority of homicides by police, there is no due process.

Brazil has a high homicide rate; 20,100 people were murdered in the first half of 2022, though that figure represented a 5 percent fall from the same period in 2021. The police force remains mired in corruption, and serious police abuses, including extrajudicial killings, continued in 2022. Police officers are rarely prosecuted for abuses, and those charged are almost never convicted. In May 2022, the Violence Monitor—a project of the G1 news site, the Center for the Study of Violence, and the Brazilian Public Security Forum (FBSP)—counted more than 6,100 deaths caused by police in 2021. Some 81.5 percent of the victims whose race was known were Black.

Police violence is particularly acute in Rio de Janeiro State. According to the May 2022 Violence Monitor report, police killed 1,356 people there, the most of any state in the country. A raid that took place in Vila Cruzeiro that month resulted in 22 deaths. Police violence is also prevalent in several other states; incidents in the states of Bahia, Goiás, São Paulo, Pará, Paraná, and Rio de Janeiro accounted for over 70 percent of all deaths by police in 2021.

Conditions in severely overcrowded prisons are life-threatening, characterized by disease, inadequate food, and deadly gang-related violence. Violence is more likely to affect poor, Black prisoners.

Indigenous people are also at physical risk. In its August 2022 report, the Indigenous Missionary Council (CIMI) counted 176 murders of Indigenous people in 2021, its second-highest figure. CIMI also reported 148 suicides, its highest-ever figure. In July 2022, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights voiced their concern over attacks on Indigenous people and called on the government to better protect them.

While Brazilian society is largely tolerant, some populations are not able to fully exercise their human rights in practice.

Just over half of the population identifies as Black or of mixed race. Afro-Brazilians suffer from high rates of poverty and illiteracy, and almost 80 percent of Brazilians living in extreme poverty are Black or mixed race. Victims of violence in Brazil are predominantly young, Black, and poor: According to a July 2022 FBSP report, 77.9 percent of murder victims in 2021 were Black. The FBSP also counted 1,341 femicides in 2021, a 1.7 percent decrease from 2020.

In 2019, despite intense pressure from some religious and political leaders, the Supreme Court ruled LGBT+ people are protected under a criminal law that prohibits discrimination on the basis of "race, color, ethnicity, religion, and national origin." However, Brazil reportedly has one of the world's highest levels of anti-LGBT+ violence. According to a February 2022 report by Grupo Gay da Bahia, an LGBT+ advocacy organization, 276 LGBT+ people were killed in 2021 because of homophobic violence, while another 24 died by suicide. The group's figures represented an 8 percent increase over 2020.

Many Indigenous communities—who comprise about 1 percent of the population—suffer from poverty and lack adequate sanitation and education services. The Indigenous population faces considerable discrimination, and their lands have been subject to increased pressure under Bolsonaro, encouraged by his rhetoric and support for easing environmental laws. The National Indian Foundation, a government agency for Indigenous affairs, was weakened during the Bolsonaro administration.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Brazilians enjoy freedom to travel within and outside of the country, and to make decisions about their places of residence and employment, though access to high-quality education across all levels remains a challenge. Gang violence in favelas has sometimes impeded free movement and has prompted schools to shut down temporarily.

While property rights are generally enforced, laws granting Indigenous populations exclusive use of certain lands are not always upheld, sometimes leading to violent conflicts. According to the Pastoral Land Commission, 35 people were murdered over land disputes in 2021, a 75 percent increase compared to 2020. CIMI, meanwhile, counted 305 cases of land invasion, illegal exploitation, or property damage against Indigenous people in 2021. According to Human Rights Watch (HRW), the federal government effectively ceased collecting environmental fines starting in 2019, even as illegal deforestation increased.

Requirements for starting new businesses are often onerous, but authorities have taken steps to ease the process. Corruption and organized crime can pose obstacles to private business activity.

The government generally does not restrict social freedoms. Same-sex marriage became legal in 2013. Gender-based violence remains widespread, though legislation has been introduced to combat it. A 2006 law sought to address high rates of impunity for domestic violence. Law 14.188 amended the penal code to criminalize simple bodily harm due to gender and criminalize psychological violence against women.

Abortion is legal only in the case of rape, a threat to the mother's life, or a rare and usually fatal brain deformity in the fetus. However, women and young girls are denied their legal right to abortion due to discretionary acts from the bureaucracy and judicial system. As many as one million Brazilians seek abortions through clandestine means annually, including by traveling abroad.

Slavery-like working conditions pose a significant problem in rural and urban zones. A 2012 constitutional amendment allows the government to confiscate all property of landholders found to be using slave labor, a measure Bolsonaro criticized. Deeply entrenched patterns of discrimination, including precarious informal employment, contributed to Afro-Brazilians suffering high COVID-19-related mortality rates.

COVID-19 and inflation have exacerbated inequality in Brazil. State spending to address inequality was obstructed when a 20-year budgetary spending cap was enacted in 2016, though the Bolsonaro administration was able to increase aid payments for part of 2022. Over 33 million people in Brazil faced extreme poverty as of June.

Brunei

Population: 400,000
Capital: Bandar Seri Begawan
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Brunei is an absolute monarchy in which the sultan exercises executive power. There are no elected representatives at the national level. Freedoms of the press and assembly are significantly restricted. Online speech is monitored by authorities, but people still express their views on many topics.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In October, the Brunei government signed multiple agreements with the government of Bangladesh to increase the number of Bangladeshi workers in Brunei and to increase the number of flights between the two countries so as to ease migrant workers' travel. In the past, rights groups have noted that Bangladeshi workers are subject to awful and inhumane conditions in Brunei. Workers who were promised salaried jobs upon arrival have found no employment, and employers have seized workers' passports to prevent them from accessing services and from leaving for another job.
- In June, Hajah Romaizah became the first woman ever appointed to the cabinet. She will serve a four-year term as education minister, replacing the previous minister before the end of their term. Women do not hold meaningful political representation: of the 33 seats on the Legislative Council, only 3 are women.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 7 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The hereditary sultan, Hassanal Bolkiah Mu'izzaddin Waddaulah, is the head of state and prime minister, and continues to wield broad powers under a state of emergency imposed in 1962.

In recent years, authorities have appeared to be paving the way for Hassanal's son, Prince Al-Muhtadee Billah, to take power. There are no indications that any transition would involve moving away from a traditional monarchy.

The unicameral Legislative Council has no political standing independent of the sultan, who appoints its 33 members. Brunei has not held direct legislative elections since 1962.

Elections are held for village-level councils that play a consultative role, though candidates are vetted by the government.

There are no national-level electoral laws, and there have not been any national, direct legislative elections in over five decades.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16

Genuine political activity by opposition groups remains extremely limited. The National Development Party (NDP) was permitted to register in 2005 after pledging to work as a partner with the government and swearing loyalty to the sultan; it is Brunei's only registered party, but does not have representation in the Legislative Council, which is appointed.

There are no national-level elections in which opposition forces could gain power.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

With the dominance of the sultan and lack of elections, residents have few avenues for genuine and autonomous political participation.

Members of ethnic, religious, and other minority groups have few opportunities for political participation, even on a local level. Village council candidates must be Muslim, and ministers and deputy ministers must be Muslim and Malay unless the sultan grants an exception.

Women do not hold meaningful political representation. Of the 33 seats on the Legislative Council, only 3 are women. However, in June 2022, Hajah Romaizah became the first woman ever appointed to the cabinet. She will serve a four-year term as education minister, replacing the previous minister before the end of their term. LGBT+ people have no political representation, and open expressions of nonbinary gender identities and same-sex relations are criminalized, with the latter punishable by death.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

No national-level policymakers are chosen through elections. The sultan wields broad powers and is counseled by appointed advisory bodies and the appointed legislature. The Legislative Council only serves to suggest changes to policies and legislation that ultimately need the approval of the sultan.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

In 2015, the government enacted amendments to the Prevention of Corruption Act, which strengthened the anticorruption framework by establishing new conflict of interest rules for public officials, among other provisions. The government claims to have a zero-tolerance policy on corruption, and its Anti-Corruption Bureau has successfully prosecuted several lower-level officials.

In early 2020, two former judges were convicted of charges including money laundering over accusations that they embezzled millions of dollars from government-controlled accounts. In July 2021, the Court of Appeal upheld their convictions and lengthened their prison sentences.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Although the appointed Legislative Council has no independent power, it formally passes the state budget and engages in question-and-answer sessions with government officials.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 21 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Officials may close newspapers without cause and fine and imprison journalists for up to three years for reporting deemed "false and malicious." Brunei's only television station is state-run. The country's main English-language daily newspaper, the Borneo Bulletin, is controlled by the sultan's family and its journalists often practice self-censorship. The Scoop, a news site that launched in 2017, contains mildly independent coverage.

The state religion is the Shafi'i school of Sunni Islam, but the constitution allows for the practice of other religions. Non-Shafi'i forms of Islam are actively discouraged, and marriage between Muslims and non-Muslims is not allowed. Muslims require permission from the Ministry of Religious Affairs to convert to other faiths. Christians are allowed to hold low-key Christmas celebrations inside churches or at homes, but not outdoors or at shopping malls.

In 2014, Brunei implemented new criminal regulations based on Sharia (Islamic law), which include limits on the use of certain words and expressions deemed to be sacred to Islam in reference to other religions. The code also includes a ban on proselytizing of a religion other than Islam and requires Muslims to participate in religious observances. In 2019, the government implemented a second phase that mandated death by stoning for insulting the prophet Muhammad, though a moratorium on this phase was issued that May.

Academic freedom is respected to some extent, although institutions must seek approval from authorities to host visiting scholars, public lectures, and conferences. Scholars reportedly practice self-censorship.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

The government utilizes an informant system to monitor suspected dissidents, and online communications are monitored for subversive content. Nevertheless, Brunei has an increasingly active and vibrant online community, and this continued in 2022, though internet users reportedly self-censor regarding issues related to the monarchy.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Long-standing state-of-emergency laws restrict freedom of assembly. No more than 10 people can assemble for any purpose without a permit, and these laws are frequently enforced.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Most nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are professional or business groups, although some work on issues related to social welfare. All groups must register, registration can be refused for any reason, and registered groups can be suspended.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The law guarantees the right to form and join a union, but the agreement that had permitted Brunei's only formerly active union, the Brunei Oilfield Workers Union, is expired. Strikes are illegal, and collective bargaining is not recognized.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Brunei has a dual judicial system of secular and Sharia courts; all senior judges are appointed by the sultan. The courts appear to act independently when handling civil matters, and have yet to be tested in political cases or under the new regulations recently phased in. They have not shown independence in any cases relating to the sultan's interests, however.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Civil and criminal law is based on English common law and is enforced in secular courts, while Sharia is enforced in Sharia courts. People detained under the Internal Security Act lack due process rights including the presumption of innocence.

The country's controversial Sharia-based penal code was delayed for several years; Brunei introduced the first phase in 2014 but did not fully implement the code, which contains penalties including amputations and death by stoning, until 2019.

The government only provides an attorney to indigent defendants in death penalty cases. To address this gap in access to justice, the Law Society of Brunei launched a pilot program for the country's first legal aid fund in 2018.

Brunei retained the death penalty for crimes including drug trafficking before the new Sharia code was launched. However, no individual has been executed since 1957. Prison conditions generally meet international standards.

Sharia-based criminal statutes implemented in 2019 contain more severe penalties for violations including consensual same-sex relations, theft, and adultery; they vary from whippings to amputations and death by stoning. That May, the sultan issued a "de facto moratorium on capital punishment," but did not issue clarification on the other provisions.

Bruneian citizenship is inherited from citizen fathers. Citizen mothers must complete an application to pass citizenship on to children born to a noncitizen father. Thousands of stateless residents of Brunei, including longtime ethnic Chinese residents, are denied the full rights and benefits granted to citizens.

LGBT+ people living in Brunei are subject to severe penalties for same-sex relations under Sharia-based laws. Under regulations introduced in 2019, consensual same-sex acts can be punished by death, or by whipping if the offenders are female.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Freedom of movement is respected. All government employees, domestic and foreign, must apply for permission to travel abroad, but permission is easily obtained. The Brunei authorities maintained some pandemic-related restrictions in 2022 but eased them in line with epidemiological data.

Stateless children do not have free access to education and instead must apply to enroll in schools; if accepted they sometimes have to pay tuition not required of citizens.

Bruneian citizens are able to own property and can establish businesses with relative ease, but protections for private property are weak. State-linked firms dominate many sectors of the economy, and the government heavily subsidizes a number of industries.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Women are disadvantaged in Brunei under Islamic law in matters involving divorce and child custody. The Sharia penal code criminalizes "indecent behavior," enjoins women to dress "modestly," and makes abortion and extramarital sex capital offenses. There is no specific law against domestic violence, and spousal rape is not criminalized.

Transgender people are prohibited from dressing in line with their gender identity under the Sharia-based penal code.

There is no private-sector minimum wage in Brunei. Migrants who come to Brunei to serve as household workers are often coerced into involuntary servitude or debt bondage and can face varying forms of abuse. Workers who overstay visas are regularly imprisoned and, in some cases, caned.

In October 2022, the Brunei government signed multiple agreements with the government of Bangladesh to increase the number of Bangladeshi workers in Brunei and to increase the number of flights between the two countries so as to ease migrant workers' travel. In the past, rights groups have noted that Bangladeshi workers are subject to awful and inhumane conditions in Brunei. Workers who were promised salaried jobs upon arrival have found no employment, and employers have seized workers' passports to prevent them from accessing services and from leaving for another job.

According to the US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report, Brunei has not made substantial efforts or dedicated adequate resources to preventing human trafficking. The Brunei government has disputed the claims of the US report.

Bulgaria

Population: 6,800,000
Capital: Sofia
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Multiple parties compete in Bulgaria's democratic system, which features peaceful transfers of power between rival parties. The country continues to struggle with political corruption and organized crime. Though the media sector remains pluralistic, outlets face pressure from political and business interests, and ownership concentration remains a problem. Ethnic minority groups, particularly Roma, face discrimination. Despite funding shortages and other obstacles, civil society groups remain active and influential.

- The country was plunged into another round of political crisis when the coalition government of Prime Minister Kiril Petkov lost a parliamentary no-confidence vote just seven months after being formed.
- After the parliament then failed to elect a new government, snap elections were called for October—the fourth parliamentary elections since April 2021. The result was yet another fragmented parliament which at year's end was still struggling to elect a regular government. Due to political instability, lawmakers struggled to address a number of crises during the year, including spiking inflation and other troubles related to the full-scale Russian military invasion of Ukraine.
- In December, the caretaker government moved rapidly to amend the electoral code to reintroduce paper ballots, prompting protests among citizens who argued that a shift away from digital voting machines could facilitate fraud.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, directly elected for up to two five-year terms, is the head of state. The prime minister, who serves as head of government, is chosen by the legislature. Though presidential powers are generally limited, in the event that parliament cannot form a government the president has the power to dissolve the National Assembly, schedule new elections, and appoint a caretaker government.

In November 2021, incumbent president Rumen Radev was reelected with 65.8 percent of the vote in the second round of the presidential elections. Radev, an independent candidate, was supported by the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP), the We Continue the Change party (PP), and the anti-elite There Is Such a People party (ITN). The election was assessed by international observers to be generally competitive and free, though some irregularities, including problems with voting machines, were noted.

In December 2021, the newly elected parliament confirmed Kiril Petkov, a member of the PP, as prime minister. In June 2022 ITN withdrew its ministers from the government and joined an opposition-led no-confidence vote that toppled the government. The parliament failed to form a new government; President Radev dissolved it in early August, called new elections for October 2, and appointed a caretaker government led by Prime Minister Galab Donev. At year's end the parliament remained fragmented and had not elected a regular government.

The unicameral National Assembly, with 240 members, is elected every four years in 31 multimember constituencies.

Regular parliamentary elections were held as scheduled in April 2021, and two more elections were called that year after parliament failed to form a regular government. The PP, at that time a newly formed, centrist party, won the third set of parliamentary elections with 25.5 percent of the vote. It formed a coalition government with the BSP, the ITN, and the Democratic Bulgaria alliance (DB). After forming, the coalition—which occupies 134 seats in the National Assembly—announced that it would govern based on a shared anticorruption platform.

All three parliamentary elections held in 2021 were deemed to be generally competitive and free by international election observation missions. However, alleged instances of voter intimidation and vote-buying by various groups, including by the Movement for Rights and Freedoms (DPS) party, were reported; such irregularities are persistent in economically and socially vulnerable communities. The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) election observation mission also reported the "massive" misuse of government resources by the incumbent Citizens for European Development of Bulgaria (GERB) during the April 2021 elections.

After the fall of the Petkov government in June 2022 and the dissolution of parliament in early August, President Radev called early elections for October 2, 2022. Election monitors found the polls generally free and fair, though OSCE observers noted that the president and the government he appointed played "a prominent part" in the electoral campaign by issuing several statements criticizing Petkov's government.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Central Election Commission (CEC) administers Bulgaria's elections and generally works professionally and impartially, though some flaws have been reported in past elections. In recent years, changes to the electoral framework have been introduced just ahead of elections with little opportunity for debate or public comment, some of which have had negative effects for electoral administration. In late 2022, the caretaker government moved rapidly to amend the electoral code to reintroduce paper ballots, prompting protests among citizens who argued that a shift away from digital voting machines could facilitate fraud.

The OSCE, in its assessment of the October 2022 elections, noted that "several longstanding concerns" about the electoral process persisted, including "inconsistencies and ambiguous provisions" that negatively affected election administration and media coverage of the campaign.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

Political parties operate freely. The political-party landscape is quite volatile, featuring both established parties like the BSP and DPS, as well as cycles in which new parties emerge while others decline or disappear. Several new parties emerged and gained power in 2020 and 2021, including both the ITN and the PP, members of the coalition government formed after the November 2021 parliamentary elections. Yet another newcomer—Bulgarian Rise, led by former prime minister Stefan Yanev—entered the parliament in the October 2022 elections.

There have been multiple peaceful transfers of power between rival parties through elections since the end of communist rule in 1990.

Bulgarians are generally free to make independent political choices. However, limited public funding and unlimited private funding for political parties leaves parties vulnerable to undue influence by private and corporate donors. Vote-buying remains an endemic problem. People in smaller communities (including Roma, but not only) are frequently pressured to vote for the party that controls the city council or has appointed the mayor, or for the party favored by the biggest employers in the area (a phenomenon known as a "controlled" or "corporate" vote).

Prominent businessmen dominate major political parties and exert influence over party platforms and policy decisions, and some are also able to advance their agenda through media holdings. The problem of business influence in politics is exacerbated by a lack of transparency in campaign finance laws.

While marginalized groups generally have full political rights, the law dictates that electoral campaigns must be conducted in the Bulgarian language, which hinders outreach to non-Bulgarian-speaking minority groups. The ethnic Turkish minority is represented by the DPS, but the Roma are more marginalized. Small Romany parties are active, and many Roma reportedly vote for the DPS, though none hold seats in the parliament. Courts have continued to deny registration to the political party OMO Ilinden, which seeks legal recognition of a Macedonian ethnic minority in Bulgaria.

Members of far-right nationalist parties have engaged in hate speech against Roma, ethnic Turks, Jews, Muslims, migrants, and refugees, among other groups, particularly during election periods.

Women are underrepresented in parliament, and the inclusion of women's issues in politics is generally lacking.

So-called oligarchs exert influence on the vote in smaller municipalities and within marginalized groups in particular, an issue referred to as the "controlled" or "corporate" vote.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected executive and legislative officials in general are able to set and implement policies without undue interference from external or unelected entities. However, "oligarch" politicians exert influence on policy making and on legislative support for the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Bulgaria, which joined the EU in 2007, has struggled to meet the bloc's anticorruption requirements amid resistance from much of the political class. Anticorruption laws are not adequately enforced, including in high-profile cases, contributing to a culture of impunity.

In 2022, during the short-lived Petkov government, actions against corrupt practices introduced by the previous GERB governments were undertaken. The state reclaimed phytosanitary control over the Bulgarian-Turkish border in May, for example (though a court later overturned the move); the previous lax controls had been criticized for allowing agricultural products with unacceptable levels of pesticides into the country, and allegedly had led to an increase in drug smuggling. Under Petkov's administration, authorities also said they had identified billions of dollars' worth of public construction contracts that were signed in the absence of proper procurement procedures.

Meanwhile, the March 2022 arrest of former prime minister Boyko Borissov on suspicion of corrupt dealings while in office—allegations linked to investigations by the EU prosecutor's office—did not result in charges against him. (The arrest itself was deemed illegal by a court in August, on grounds of procedural irregularities.)

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Although Bulgaria has laws meant to ensure that the government operates with transparency, they are only partially enforced. While the transparency in the work of Parliament, the cabinet, and municipal bodies has increased considerably in recent years, public access to information about budgets and spending of various government agencies is sometimes inadequate or presented in an inaccessible way.

Government transparency improved during the short-lived Petkov government. The caretaker government appointed by President Radev has been less open about decisions, as well as reasons for the dismissal and appointment of new senior officials at key governmental offices and ministries.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 46 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of expression, including for the press, but journalists face threats and pressure from private owners or public media management. Even though the media sector remains pluralistic, many outlets are dependent on financial contributions from the state (through advertising), effectively resulting in pressure to run government-friendly material. Ownership concentration remains a problem.

During the Petkov government there were no reports of governmental pressures over journalists either in private or in the public media. However, private media ownership remains opaque, raising concerns of undue business and political influence over editorial content.

Journalists can face defamation suits in relation to legitimate investigative work. In 2022, the private investment company Eurohold filed a defamation case that threatens the survival of the investigative site Bivol, which had investigated its fundraising activities. Also during the year, the prosecutorial office pressured an investigative journalist and the editor in chief of a major business weekly, Capital, demanding that they reveal their sources of information.

In October 2022 the Vazrazhdane (Revival) party introduced to the parliament a Russian-style law on the registration of "foreign agents" that would, among other things, require media that had received 1,000 lev ($560) or more from a foreign source to register as a "foreign agent." (This designation has been used elsewhere to demonize legitimately operating media and nongovernmental organizations [NGOs] as tools of foreign meddlers.)

Religious freedom is generally respected, but members of minority faiths in the mostly Orthodox Christian country have reported instances of harassment and discrimination, and some local authorities have prohibited proselytizing and other religious activities by such groups. A 2016 law that imposed fines for the wearing of face-covering garments in public locations was widely understood to be directed against Muslims.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally upheld in practice.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Freedom of expression is guaranteed by the constitution. However, Bulgaria's criminal code allows for legal secret surveillance of citizens in a wide range of cases, and concerns persist that authorities have misused such surveillance laws in order to monitor citizens who criticize the government. However, there were no reports of such scandals in 2022.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The authorities generally respect constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly.

NGOs operate freely and have a degree of influence, though they experience funding shortages, often rely on foreign donors, and sometimes face hostility from politicians and interest groups. In October 2022, the far-right Russophile political party Revival filed a draft law requiring all media and private persons receiving foreign funding of 1,000 lev or more to register as "foreign agents." In a way reminiscent of the law introduced in Russia in 2012, it aims to ban "foreign agents" from offering educational activities, working with the government, and engaging in other activity. The bill has not drawn support from other parties in parliament.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers have the right to join trade unions, which are generally able to operate, but some public employees cannot legally strike. Collective bargaining is legal, and collective contracts are listed in a specialized public registry. While trade unions partner with the government and the business community to discuss public budgets and other issues like retirement age, pension reforms, and health care reforms, their influence is weak.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

Bulgaria's judiciary has benefited from legal and institutional reforms associated with EU membership, but is still prone to politicization. Despite significant legislation formally guaranteeing judicial independence, the members and governing bodies of the judiciary often act in accordance with the ruling majority.

A Supreme Judicial Council (SJC) is responsible for judicial and prosecutorial appointments and management, with half the members (six judges, four prosecutors, and an investigator) elected by their peers and half by a two-thirds parliamentary majority. Bulgarian legal observers have reported that in practice, requiring a two-thirds majority vote in parliament to appoint SJC members has allowed political parties—including minority parties such as DPS—to exert undue influence over the selection and appointment of the country's top magistrates.

The Supreme Administrative Court has controversially ruled to annul government decisions. One such ruling in 2022 annulled the government decision to return phytosanitary control over a Turkish-Bulgarian border crossing 2022 to a private company.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Constitutional rights to due process are not always upheld. Police have been accused of misconduct, including arbitrary arrests and failure to inform suspects of their rights. The arrest in March 2022 of former prime minister Borissov on suspicion of corruption while in office did not follow the procedural rules and in August was held illegal by a court, reflecting occasional violations of due process in Bulgaria.

Public trust in the justice system is low due to its reputed vulnerability to political and outside pressure.

The relatively lengthy seven-year mandate granted to the prosecutor general and the lack of effective accountability mechanisms have long been noted as major problems with the prosecutorial office, weakening due process and rule of law in the country. The prosecutor general's strong influence with regard to career promotion and within the SJC inhibits individuals from voicing and investigating allegations of misconduct within the office.

Although the population faces few acute threats to physical security, police brutality, including abuse of suspects in custody, remains a problem. Overcrowding and violence plague many of Bulgaria's prisons. Organized crime is still an issue.

Ethnic minorities, particularly the Roma, face discrimination in employment, health care, education, and housing, though the government and NGOs operate a number of programs meant to improve their social integration. Authorities periodically demolish illegally constructed or irregular housing—mostly in areas occupied by Roma—without providing alternative shelter. The Romany minority was also subject to disproportionately severe pandemic-related restrictions throughout 2020.

Migrants and asylum seekers have reportedly faced various forms of mistreatment by Bulgarian authorities, including beatings and extortion.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity is illegal, but societal bias against LGBT+ people persists. While anti-LGBT+ violence has been significantly underreported in Bulgaria, and largely goes unaddressed by authorities, there were no registered homophobia-motivated hate crimes in Bulgaria in 2022, and LGBT+ groups note some slowly increasing tolerance toward LGBT+ people. To date, homophobia has not been added to the penal code as an aggravating factor in hate crimes.

A gender equality law passed in 2016 was designed to foster equal opportunity for women, but discrimination in employment persists: women are employed less often and paid less than men.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

For the most part, Bulgarians face few major restrictions on their freedom of movement. However, the government restricts the ability of asylum seekers to move outside of the district where they are housed.

The legal and regulatory framework is generally supportive of property rights and private business, though property rights are not always respected in practice, and corruption continues to hamper business and investment. The gray economy of undeclared business activity has been estimated at over 20 percent of the country's economy. Attempts at business raiding, including with the suspected assistance of state institutions and the prosecutorial office, are perceived to be on the rise and were among the triggers of major antigraft protests in 2020–21.

The law generally grants equal rights to men and women regarding personal status matters such as marriage and divorce. However, Bulgaria does not recognize same-sex marriages or same-sex unions, nor does it allow same-sex couples to adopt or register as parents of a child. The European Court of Justice in late 2021 ruled that a lesbian couple's daughter—born in Spain in 2019 to a Bulgarian national and a British national but considered stateless herself—must be issued a Bulgarian passport, raising hopes that this issue would be finally resolved in Bulgaria.

Domestic violence remains a problem. People who have experienced domestic violence and NGOs addressing gender-based violence claim that state authorities are often ineffective in providing protection and pursuing criminal charges when abuse is reported.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Labor laws provide basic protections against exploitative working conditions, but they do not extend in practice to gray-market employment. Roma and other ethnic minorities are particularly vulnerable to trafficking for sexual and labor exploitation. Although the government has continued to step up efforts to combat trafficking, shelter victims, and punish perpetrators, these measures have not matched the scale of the problem, and punishments remain light in practice.

Burkina Faso

Population: 22,700,000
Capital: Ouagadougou
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Status Change: Burkina Faso's status declined from Partly Free to Not Free due to the effects of two successive military coups, including the suspension of the constitution and dissolution of the legislature, and an expanding conflict with Islamist militant groups.

Overview: Two separate coups organized by the military in 2022 plunged Burkina Faso into political crisis, eliminating many of the significant political reforms implemented after the 2014–15 political transition. While civil society and organized labor remain strong forces for democracy, Burkinabè also face continued insecurity and violence from armed militant groups, militia groups, and government forces, displacing millions of people. Though the military's justification for its two illegal seizures of power was to address growing security and humanitarian crises, insecurity worsened following the takeovers.

- In January, Lieutenant Colonel Paul-Henri Sandaogo Damiba led a military coup that ousted the democratically elected president, Roch Marc Christian Kaboré. Damiba justified his actions by citing the worsening security situation and Kaboré's inability to resolve it. A temporary government was installed by the military junta in March, with Damiba naming himself president.
- Captain Ibrahim Traoré led a second coup in September, dismissing Damiba's transitional government, suspending the constitution, and placing power in the military junta Traoré had formed and led. Less than two weeks later in October, the Traoré junta organized a national forum, during which Traoré was formally recognized as president. The forum also drafted a charter that provided him the authority to name a transitional government and legislate by decree until the naming of legislators.
- In April, former president Blaise Compaoré was found guilty of conspiracy in the 1987 assassination of former president Thomas Sankara and was sentenced to life in prison in absentia. Despite his conviction, in July Compaoré traveled from Côte d'Ivoire, where he had been living, to Ouagadougou at the invitation of then junta-leader Damiba. He was allowed to stay for a few days before returning to Côte d'Ivoire.
- The security environment was deteriorating in the country before the first coup in January, but the two seizures of power during the year by military juntas deepened the crisis. Security forces and state-aligned militias have committed widespread extrajudicial violence and Islamist groups have attacked armed forces and civilians openly, all of which has displaced millions of civilians. More than two dozen Fulani people were killed by armed groups in the town of Nouna in late December.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 3 / 40 (−20)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12 (−7)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (−2)

Two separate military coups in 2022 restored military rule after nearly eight years of political reforms that had yielded democratic gains. In January, Lieutenant Colonel Paul-Henri Sandaogo Damiba led a military coup that ousted the democratically elected president, Roch Marc Christian Kaboré. Captain Ibrahim Traoré led the second coup in September, dismissing the transitional government set up by Damiba in March, suspending the constitution, and placing power in the military junta he had formed and led. Less than two weeks later, in October, the Traoré junta organized a national forum, during which Traoré was formally recognized as president. The forum also drafted a transitional charter which provided him with the authority to name a transitional government and legislate by decree until the naming of legislators.

Traoré named Appollinaire Joachim Kyelem de Tambela as his prime minister to serve as head of a 23-member transitional government, which was created in late October.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 due to two separate coups fomented by military officers that removed the elected and interim presidents.

The two coups dissolved both the elected parliament and the subsequent transitional bodies. In November 2022, the Traoré-led junta and its national forum established a 71-member transitional legislature through the transitional charter. Twenty members of the legislature were chosen by Traoré. The rest were made up of 16 members from the security and defense forces; 13 civil society leaders who were not affiliated with a political movement; 12 members from political parties (4 from the former majority party, 4 from the former opposition, 2 from the unaffiliated opposition, and 2 from other parties); and 10 other members from civil society. The 20 members appointed by Traoré and the 16 from the security and defense forces make up a one-seat majority at 36 members. The charter cannot be revised without Traoré's support and a two-thirds majority vote from the transitional legislature.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 because coup leaders dissolved the elected parliament in January, and a subsequent transitional assembly was dissolved in the September coup.

The transitional charter, which operates as the guiding legal text under Traoré's junta, stipulates that all legal matters be determined by the 1991 constitution unless otherwise decided by the transitional legislature. Until the legislative session opened in November 2022, Traoré legislated by decree. There is no defined electoral framework in the interim other than a deadline to hold elections by 2024.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 0 because coup leaders suspended the constitution in January and again in September, effectively overturning existing electoral law.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16 (−8)

The laws regulating political parties were effectively suspended following the January and September 2022 coups. Political parties received token representation in the transitional legislature based on their affiliations under the previous civilian administration. Immediately following the September coup, the junta suspended all political and civil society activity,though they restored party and civil society representation in the weeks following. The suspension underscored the limited power political parties and civil society wield in the current military government.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the military dissolved the elected parliament and has dominated the subsequent transition, limiting the ability of parties to function.

Following the September 2022 coup, no legal framework for an electoral process had been enacted, meaning there was no clear means for a party to gain power. Presumably, the organization and administration of elections would be a priority of the transitional legislative assembly that took office in November. The junta, Traoré, and the transitional charter stipulated that elections would be held by July 2024.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 0 because the military coups removed political parties ability to win power through elections and because no party can operate without the military's consent.

The junta has attempted to characterize its seizure of power as popular and enjoying public support, but it is effectively ruling by decree. Burkina Faso's armed forces remain fragmented, and power has changed hands in an arbitrary, tumultuous manner, all underscored by the two coups in 2022. In parts of the country, armed militant groups target local leaders for assassination and abduction, effectively controlling the territory.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 due to the military's total dominance of the political system following two coups.

The two coups in January and September 2022 have returned the military to the center of the political arena, eliminating political rights for the population.

Stigmatization of the Fulani (Peul or Fulbè) community also grew during the year, as insecurity spread throughout the northern and eastern areas of the country.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 1 because coup leaders dissolved the elected parliament in January, stopping Burkinabè from engaging in political participation through elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12 (−5)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4 (−2)

Lieutenant Colonel Damiba dissolved the National Assembly following his January 2022 coup and created a transitional government in March. Captain Traoré in late September staged another coup and in October dissolved the transitional legislature established under Damiba. Traoré legislated by decree until members of a new transitional assembly took office and a legislative session opened in November.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 because elected government bodies were dissolved by coup leaders.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4 (−1)

Prior to the 2022 coups, corruption was already widespread, particularly among customs officials and municipal police as well as several other public sectors. Few, if any, impediments remain to safeguard against official corruption following the coups of 2022. Formal bodies exist to address corruption, such as the Higher Authority for State Control and the Fight Against Corruption (ASCE-LC), and the independent Anti-Corruption National Network (REN-LAC). Their ability to provide oversight of the junta, however, has been minimal, accelerating the deleterious effects of corruption on public services.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the junta engages in corruption and allows no avenue for accountability.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4 (−2)

Very little is known about the composition of the ruling junta, which refers to itself as the Patriotic Movement for Safeguard and Restoration (MPSR). Many political parties and civil society organizations have underscored this fact and the danger this lack of transparency presents.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 due to the lack of any meaningful openness from the junta in its decision-making, its membership, and in its appointment of members to transitional bodies.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 27 / 60 (−3)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16 (−1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The media environment in Burkina Faso is relatively robust. However, growing and continued physical insecurity has curbed media access, and military leaders have further constrained the press. In May 2022, the military government blocked the operations of the Higher Council for Communication, a body tasked with ensuring respect for journalistic ethics, promoting freedom of expression, and safeguarding the media's access to sources of information. In December, Traoré appointed a new council president, allowing the agency to function again.

Authorities also suspended French broadcaster Radio France Internationale (RFI) in December, accusing them of having disseminated a message of intimidation attributed to a "terrorist leader," though they did not reference any specific RFI report. Journalists face increased risks due to militant attacks, and some have been threatened, abducted, and killed in recent years.

Burkina Faso is a secular state, and freedom of religion is generally respected. The population is predominately Muslim with a large Christian minority. Followers of both religions often engage in syncretic practices. However, religious activity is affected by ongoing insecurity. In February 2022, Islamic militant groups attacked the Saint Kisito Christian seminary in Bogui.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4 (−1)

Academic freedom is unrestricted in principle, though due to past repressive tactics against student-led protests, a legacy of tension between the government and academic organizations persists.

Islamic militant groups in the north and east regularly threaten schools and teachers, resulting in the closure of numerous institutions. These groups have killed public school officials for refusing to adhere to and teach extremist ideology and curriculums. Prolonged insecurity and militant Islamist violence has left large swathes of territory without primary and secondary education for years. From January to November 2022, 5,574 schools were closed due to insecurity, affecting over a million students.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because Islamist militant groups threatened or attacked schools and teachers for failing to adhere to and teach extremist ideology, resulting in the closure of thousands of schools, affecting more than a million students.

Private discussion is unrestricted in much of the country. However, attacks and intimidation by Islamic militants in the north and east, an increased security presence in response to their activities, and 2019 penal-code revisions have dissuaded people from discussing local news, politics, and other sensitive topics. In some areas, Burkinabè fear surveillance from the informers of Islamic militants, who may attack communities who speak out against them.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The transitional charter relies on the 1991 constitution as a legal foundation; the 1991 constitution does provide for the freedom of assembly. Demonstrations in support of the ruling junta in 2022 have appeared to occur organically and comprise at most a few hundred individuals in any mobilization.

During the chaotic days of Captain Traoré's coup from late September 2022 to early October, demonstrators in support of the coup vandalized, looted, and set fire to buildings housing French government offices. Junta leaders had claimed France was harboring Lieutenant Colonel Damiba at a military base during this period.

While many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate openly and freely, human rights groups have reported abuses by security forces in the past. NGOs face harassment in carrying out their work and NGO leaders argue that some legal provisions, including vaguely worded terrorism laws, can be misused to silence human rights defenders.

The operating space for NGOs and human rights organizations became further constrained in 2022 due to growing violence and the return of military rule. Towns, displacement camps, and large swathes of territory are routinely cut off from state authorities. Humanitarian access is limited particularly in northern Burkina Faso where armed conflict is at its worst.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The two military coups in 2022 left the basic structure of the 1991 constitution in place, which does provide for the right to strike and to form trade unions. However, the transitional charter following the September coup clearly places superseding authority in the executive to intercede in organized labor activity.

In the past, unions frequently and freely engaged in strikes and collective bargaining and coordinated with civil society to organize demonstrations on social issues. However, the government has used legal means to suppress union activity, including the denial of permits for planned demonstrations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16 (−1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary is formally independent but has historically been subject to executive influence and corruption. The Constitutional Council in October 2022 officially inaugurated Captain Traoré as president after his military coup the previous month.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional due-process guarantees are undermined by corruption and the inefficacy of the judiciary and police force. The judicial system is also affected by ongoing insecurity, which has caused the closure of some courts and has limited access to judicial services.

In April 2022, former president Blaise Compaoré was found guilty of conspiracy in the 1987 assassination of former president Thomas Sankara and was sentenced to life in prison in absentia. Despite his conviction, in July Compaoré traveled from Côte d'Ivoire, where he had been living, to Ouagadougou at the invitation of then junta-leader Damiba. He was allowed to stay for a few days before returning to Côte d'Ivoire. The high profile visit revealed the limits of the Burkinabè justice system in holding powerful figures to account.

The security environment is affected by Islamic militant groups, bandits, and militias. Traditional leaders, government officials, lawmakers, and civilians are regularly targeted for kidnapping or assassination by militants. Militants target government institutions, like health clinics and schools, restricting access to government services. Children are increasingly being recruited by militants and engage in armed activity. Ongoing violence has prompted significant internal displacement; humanitarian organizations in a joint letter in September 2022 reported that nearly 2 million Burkinabè were internally displaced.

Government forces and state-allied militias like the Volunteers for the Defense of the Homeland (VDP) commit extrajudicial violence, particularly against the Fulani ethnic group. Militants, militias, and government forces are believed to orchestrate forced disappearances. Security forces, militias, and civilians faced armed attacks during 2022, causing numerous casualties. Allegations of torture and abuse of suspects in custody by police are common, and prison conditions are poor. Security forces have been accused of forcibly detaining and abusing civilians. Security in the country has deteriorated since the military took power in the first coup of the year in January 2022.

While the constitution outlaws all forms of discrimination, prejudice occurs in practice. Members of the Fulani ethnic group have expressed dissatisfaction over government neglect, discrimination, and abuse, particularly at the hands of security forces and militias. Their treatment has worsened since the military seized power in January 2022 and recruited volunteer militias that have intentionally targeted Fulani people. More than two dozen Fulani civilians were killed, apparently by the VDP, in the town of Nouna in late December. Military rule has also eliminated legal guarantees of protection.

LGBT+ people, as well as those living with HIV, routinely experience discrimination, including difficulty accessing health services. While illegal, gender discrimination remains common in employment and education.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to an increase in discrimination against Fulani people, mostly caused by volunteer militias recruited by the junta to intentionally target members of that ethnic group.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16 (−1)

Due to insecurity, the government has established heavily guarded checkpoints on roads and has instituted curfews and states of emergency in some provinces. Travelers are sometimes subjected to bribery or harassment by security forces at checkpoints. The town of Djibo, which houses at least 285,000 internally displaced persons (IDPs), was blockaded by militants during much of 2022, making it difficult for aid groups to deliver food and medicine. Displaced women fleeing extremist violence have been targeted by Islamist militant groups, and the number of sexual assault cases has risen drastically in the Center North region. The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) said in June that authorities control only 60 percent of the country's territory.

In recent years, the government has implemented reforms to reduce the amount of capital necessary to start a business, facilitating the ability to obtain credit information, and improving the insolvency resolution process. However, the business environment is hampered by corruption and insecurity. The two military coups in 2022 cast further doubts over the regulatory environment individuals would confront.

Insurgents regularly interfered with commercial activities in 2022, including by stealing livestock, imposing taxes, and interrupting mining operations. State authorities have little control over a significant portion of the country.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because internally displaced Burkinabè have suffered the destruction of property due to conflict and because the authorities are unable to ensure property rights throughout the country.

Women face discrimination in cases involving family rights and inheritance. Early marriage remains an issue, especially in the north. The practice of female genital mutilation (FGM) is less common than in the past, but still occurs. Domestic violence remains a problem despite government efforts to combat it. Gender-based violence has become more widespread of a challenge with the rising physical insecurity driven by extremist groups. The United Nations Population Fund estimated that more than 660,000 people will need protection from sexual assault and rape.

Burkina Faso is a source, transit, and destination country for human trafficking. Child labor is prominent in the mining sector, with 20,000 children working in gold mines. Children are also recruited by militant groups. Women from neighboring countries are recruited by traffickers and transported to Burkina Faso, where they are forced into prostitution.

According to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2022, the Burkinabè government did not prosecute suspected traffickers and provided insufficient support and shelter for trafficking survivors during the report's coverage period.

Burundi

Population: 12,900,000
Capital: Gitega
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Burundi has been in political and economic crisis since 2015. Democratic gains made after the 12-year civil war ended in 2005 have been undone by a shift toward authoritarian politics and violent repression against perceived opponents of the ruling party, the National Council for the Defense of Democracy–Forces for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD).

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In August, President Évariste Ndayishimiye dismissed dozens of judges accused of corruption and mismanagement. The judges were convicted on corruption-related charges later that month, and were issued sentences of up to 30 years' imprisonment and fines of up to 3.3 million Burundian francs ($1,640).
- In August, Burundian troops associated with an East African Community (EAC) mission were deployed in the eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC). EAC member states had agreed to deploy forces there to help the Congolese government fight armed groups in the region.
- In September, Ndayishimiye accused then prime minister Alain-Guillaume Bunyoni of planning a coup and removed him from office. Former security minister Gervais Ndirakobuca was appointed to replace Bunyoni as prime minister; members of Parliament unanimously approved Ndirakobuca's appointment the same day.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 4 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Burundi adopted a new constitution in 2005 after a series of agreements ended the country's 12-year civil war. Among other provisions, the amended constitution lengthened presidential terms from five years to seven.

In January 2020, CNDD-FDD insiders selected Évariste Ndayishimiye, a former army general and interior minister, as the party's candidate to succeed outgoing president Pierre Nkurunziza for that May's election. Ndayishimiye won 71.5 percent of the vote, while Agathon Rwasa of the National Congress for Liberty (CNL) received 25.2 percent, and Gaston Sindimwo of the Union for National Progress (UPRONA) received 1.7 percent. The contest was marred by a wide-ranging campaign of repression, which the UN Commission of Inquiry (CoI) on Burundi said included the intelligence services, police, and the Imbonerakure, the ruling party's youth wing. International observers were barred from the polls. The CNL claimed that the results were fraudulent, though the Constitutional Court upheld them in June. Ndayishimiye was to take office that August but was inaugurated that June, after Nkurunziza died in office.

The president appoints a vice president, who must be approved separately by a two-thirds majority in both houses of Parliament. Prosper Bazombanza was named vice president in June 2020, while former public security minister Alain-Guillaume Bunyoni was named prime minister. In September 2022, President Ndayishimiye accused Bunyoni of planning a coup and removed him from office. Ndayishimiye then appointed former security minister Gervais Ndirakobuca as prime minister. Ndirakobuca's appointment was unanimously approved in Parliament the same day.

Parliament's lower house, the National Assembly, includes 100 members who are directly elected via proportional representation along with 23 "co-opted" members to ensure that members of the Hutu ethnic group hold 60 percent of the house while Tutsis hold 40 percent. Members serve five-year terms. The upper house, the Senate, consists of 39 members, 36 of whom are chosen by locally elected officials for five-year terms. Three seats are reserved for the Twa ethnic group.

National Assembly elections took place concurrently with the May 2020 presidential elections, amid a campaign to repress opposition groups. The CNDD-FDD secured 86 seats, while the CNL secured 32 and UPRONA secured 2. The Twa received 3 seats via co-optation.

Senators were indirectly elected in July 2020; the CNDD-FDD received 34 seats, while the CNL and UPRONA each received 1. Twa members held 3 seats.

The five-member Independent National Electoral Commission is under the effective control of the ruling CNDD-FDD. In 2015, two members who fled the country amid that year's unrest were replaced with pro-Nkurunziza appointees approved by a CNDD-FDD-controlled Parliament. Constitutional amendments extending presidential term limits, consolidating power in the executive, and allowing for a future revision of the Burundian ethnic power-sharing system were approved in a 2018 referendum that was marred by a violent intimidation campaign conducted by the CNDD-FDD.

CNL presidential candidate Rwasa challenged the conduct of the 2020 presidential election, alleging incidents of ballot-box stuffing, falsified election reports, and votes counted from deceased or exiled citizens. The Constitutional Court rejected that challenge that June.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16

Political party formation is legally allowed, but the activities of opposition parties and political leaders are discouraged under the threat of retaliatory violence, repression, or arrest.

According to the Burundi Human Rights Initiative (BHRI), opposition party members and those suspected of opposing the government faced arbitrary arrests and forced disappearances by the Imbonerakure and the National Intelligence Service (SNR) during 2021 and 2022.

The opposition has little realistic opportunity to increase its popular support through elections. Opposition parties, politicians, and their supporters face harassment, intimidation, and assassination. Many are forced to operate in exile.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The Imbonerakure, SNR, and police are allies of the CNDD-FDD and use violence and intimidation to influence people's political choices.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

The 2005 constitution requires power-sharing between Hutus and Tutsis in Parliament, and additionally stipulates that women and Twa representatives be seated in both houses.

Imelde Sabushimike, who was appointed as human rights minister in June 2020, is Burundi's first Twa cabinet minister.

Women face social pressure that can deter active political participation, and few women hold political office at senior levels.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The ruling CNDD-FDD, and particularly President Ndayishimiye, whose election to power fell far short of standards for free and fair elections, controls policy development and implementation.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is rampant in Burundi. Corrupt officials generally enjoy impunity, even when wrongdoing is exposed by nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and other actors. Anticorruption organizations are underresourced and ineffective.

Though President Ndayishimiye has vowed to address corruption, his actions in office have been contradictory. The Ndayishimiye administration dismissed over 120 government employees for embezzlement in 2021, though none of them faced prosecution. Ndayishimiye has also reorganized Burundian anticorruption bodies since taking office, abolishing an anticorruption court and an anticorruption brigade and placing their functions within existing offices.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government operations are opaque, and government officials are generally unaccountable to voters. There are few opportunities for civil society actors and others to participate in policymaking. Due to recurrent assassinations and assassination attempts, politicians are wary of organizing town hall–style meetings or making other public appearances before voters.

The government was not transparent during the COVID-19 pandemic, with authorities providing little scientific information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 10 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed but severely restricted in practice by draconian press laws and a dangerous operating environment for media workers, who face threats, harassment, and arrest in response to their coverage.

Many journalists have fled the country since 2015, and some have been forcibly disappeared. In 2021, the Supreme Court published a 2020 decision to issue life sentences against seven exiled journalists for their alleged involvement in the events of 2015.

The government lifted its ban on the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) in March 2022; the BBC's operating license had been revoked in 2019 after it aired an investigation into human rights abuses allegedly committed by the government.

Freedom of religion is generally observed. However, relations between the government and the Roman Catholic Church, of which most Burundians are members, have worsened in recent years. In 2019, the UN CoI reported that the government was exerting more control over churches to curb political dissent.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Both university students and staff who support the CNDD-FDD receive preferential treatment at academic institutions. Continued intimidation of opposition supporters has created an atmosphere of fear and limited free speech on university campuses. Reports indicate that teachers allied to the CNDD-FDD have intimidated students who are considered unsupportive, in some cases preventing them from attending school. Teachers are increasingly screened for political loyalty to the ruling party.

While freedom of expression on political matters is constitutionally guaranteed, in practice Burundians generally do not feel safe discussing issues related to the government or politics. There is a reluctance to engage in speech that could be perceived as critical of the CNDD-FDD for fear of reprisal. The SNR and the Imbonerakure actively surveil private citizens. Social media and messaging applications were notably blocked on election day in 2020.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Opposition or antigovernment meetings and rallies are usually prevented or dispersed, and participants face harassment or arrest. Many people who participated in the 2015 protests against late president Nkurunziza fled Burundi amid a subsequent crackdown.

In 2021, the UN CoI noted that the strictest restrictions on assembly were effectively loosened after the 2020 elections, as the CNL was perceived as a less acute threat to the CNDD-FDD.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 0 / 4

NGOs in Burundi face restrictive registration laws and persecution for activity seen as hostile to the government. Human rights advocates can face arrest and imprisonment. A number of human rights and other groups perceived as antigovernment were banned during the 2018 referendum and the 2020 elections, and many of their members have fled the country. A 2021 Human Rights Watch (HRW) report noted that NGO workers avoided open criticism of the government.

The government reversed its ban on anticorruption NGO PARCEM ("Words and Actions for the Awakening of Consciences and the Evolution of Mentalities") in 2021, but authorities continued to impede and monitor its work through 2022.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The constitution provides protections for organized labor, and the labor code guarantees the right to strike. However, it is unlikely that union members would feel free to exercise legally guaranteed collective bargaining rights in the current political climate.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is hindered by corruption and a lack of resources and training. The judiciary is generally subservient to the executive, which regularly interferes in the criminal justice system to protect CNDD-FDD and Imbonerakure members and persecute the political opposition.

In 2020, the Constitutional Court partially checked the CNDD-FDD's power by upholding a challenge to the disqualification of an opposition parliamentary candidate. However, it did not entertain a challenge over the conduct of the presidential election, despite evidence of widespread fraud and intimidation.

President Ndayishimiye has repeatedly accused the judiciary of corruption and human rights violations. In August 2022, Ndayishimiye dismissed 40 judges accused of corruption and mismanagement. The judges were convicted on corruption-related charges later that month, and were issued sentences ranging from 1 to 30 years in prison as well as fines of up to 3.3 million Burundian francs ($1,640).

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

The courts, police, and security forces do not operate independently or professionally, and constitutional guarantees of due process are generally not upheld. Arbitrary arrest and lengthy pretrial detention are common.

In 2017, the International Criminal Court (ICC) opened an investigation into alleged crimes against humanity committed by the government. Burundi left the ICC days later, becoming the first country in the world to do so.

The security situation in Burundi remains extremely poor. A 2021 UN CoI report notes that widespread human rights violations persist, including forced disappearance, execution, torture, and arbitrary arrest and detention. The report identified the SNR as the principal perpetrator, though it also noted the involvement of the Imbonerakure and police.

According to a July 2022 BHRI report, hundreds of Burundian soldiers and untrained Imbonerakure members were "secretly deployed" to fight the Resistance Movement for the Rule of Law–Tabara, a Burundian armed opposition group located in the DRC, as early as December 2021. Burundian troops officially entered the DRC in August 2022 as part of an EAC mission meant to help the Congolese fight armed groups active in the east of that country.

According to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, 258,000 Burundian refugees resided in nearby countries as of December 2022, 48.9 percent of them in Tanzania. The CNDD-FDD apparatus has violently targeted returning refugees on suspicion of opposition sympathies, along with individuals suspected of having ties to Burundian rebels operating in the DRC.

The Burundian prison system is overcrowded. In late November 2022, the World Prison Brief reported that although Burundian prisons have an official capacity of approximately 4,290, over 12,000 inmates are imprisoned.

Despite quotas for representation in the National Assembly, the Twa population remains marginalized relative to the Hutu and Tutsi ethnic groups. People living with albinism face systematic discrimination and violence. LGBT+ people also experience official and societal discrimination. The 2009 penal code criminalizes same-sex sexual activity, and punishments include up to two years in prison.

Discrimination against women is common in access to education, healthcare, and employment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

Since 2015, concerns for personal safety have restricted free movement, particularly in neighborhoods regarded as opposition strongholds and where security forces frequently conduct search operations. In 2020, the UN CoI reported that the Imbonerakure maintained a checkpoint system to control population movement, despite official instructions for the organization to refrain from such activity. Some local authorities have imposed curfews on women and girls.

According to the International Organization for Migration, there were over 84,000 internally displaced persons in Burundi as of April 2022.

Land conflict has been an explosive issue in Burundi for decades, which was exacerbated by the return of displaced populations after the end of the civil war in 2005. Many returnees found new owners occupying their land, and the courts have often failed to fairly adjudicate land disputes.

Due to customary law, women are typically unable to inherit property. The deteriorating security situation hampers private business activity in Burundi, as does rampant corruption.

Sexual and domestic violence are serious problems but are rarely reported to law enforcement agencies. Rights monitors continue to report sexual violence carried out by security forces and the Imbonerakure, who act with impunity. Women are often targeted for rape if they or their spouses refuse to join the CNDD-FDD. Men sometimes experience sexual abuse while in government custody.

According to the citizenship code, a Burundian woman married to a foreign national cannot pass on her citizenship to her husband or children.

The constitution explicitly bans same-sex marriage.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Individuals not allied with the ruling party may lose their employment. Community service requirements have taken on political overtones, such as building offices for the CNDD-FDD, amounting to what a 2019 UN report called forced labor.

Women have limited opportunities for advancement in the workplace. Much of the population is impoverished. In 2017, "vagrancy" and begging by able-bodied persons became formal offenses under the penal code.

Human trafficking continues to be a serious issue in Burundi, with the IOM counting over 1,000 trafficking victims between 2017 and July 2021. Burundian government employees are reportedly complicit in trafficking girls. According to the US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report, Burundi's government has significantly expanded investigations, prosecutions, and convictions of traffickers, including allegedly complicit officials.

Cabo Verde

Population: 600,000
Capital: Praia
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Cabo Verde is a stable democracy with competitive elections and periodic transfers of power between rival parties. Civil liberties are generally protected, but access to justice is impaired by an overburdened court system, and crime remains a concern. Other outstanding problems include persistent inequities for women and migrant workers.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, the government declared a social and economic emergency due to the effects of the war in Ukraine, COVID-19, and recent droughts on access to food and other basic supplies. While the declaration prompted official efforts to stabilize prices and seek international aid, it did not lead to restrictions on citizens' rights and freedoms.
- The parliament adopted a number of legislative reforms during the year, including measures to combat tax evasion and improve oversight of public spending.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected for up to two consecutive five-year terms. The prime minister, who holds most executive authority, is formally appointed by the president but is nominated by and accountable to the National Assembly.

Ulisses Correia e Silva became prime minister in 2016 and secured a new term after his center-right Movement for Democracy (MpD) party won the April 2021 parliamentary elections. In October of that year, José Maria Neves of the left-leaning African Party for the Independence of Cabo Verde (PAICV) was elected president with 51.7 percent of the vote, defeating MpD candidate Carlos Veiga. Neves, who succeeded term-limited MpD incumbent Jorge Carlos Fonseca, took office in November. Observers assessed both elections as largely free and fair.

Members of the 72-seat National Assembly are directly elected in multimember constituencies to serve five-year terms. In the April 2021 elections, the ruling MpD won 38 seats, the PAICV won 30, and the Democratic and Independent Cabo Verdean Union took 4.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The legal framework provides for fair and competitive elections. The National Elections Commission (CNE), whose members are elected by a two-thirds majority in the National Assembly, is generally considered impartial.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

There are no significant impediments to the formation and competition of political parties. A number of different parties are active, though only the PAICV and the MpD have held power at the national level. Nonpartisan independents also participate in elections and play a role in political life.

The opposition has a realistic opportunity to gain power through elections. There have been three democratic transfers of power between the PAICV and the MpD since independence in 1975, with the most recent occurring in 2016.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The political choices of voters and candidates are free from undue external influence. However, the functioning of public agencies is reportedly affected by partisanship.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Women have full and equal political rights and are increasingly involved in politics. Nevertheless, social constraints have somewhat impaired their participation. The 40 percent gender quota for candidates required by the 2019 Gender Parity Law is often unmet, though women held 38.9 percent of the National Assembly's seats after the 2021 elections and 42 percent of the seats in municipal assemblies.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The prime minister and cabinet determine the policies of the government, under the supervision of the National Assembly and the president. The government is able to implement laws and policies without undue interference from unelected entities.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Cabo Verde has relatively low levels of corruption overall, but bribery and nepotism are problems at the municipal level. Allegations of clientelism and graft continue to surround costly infrastructure projects and other spending measures, public procurements, public companies, and management of public lands.

In March 2022, the cabinet approved a revision of the penal code to extend the statute of limitations for offenses related to corruption and influence peddling, correcting an error in a previous amendment. The parliament adopted the revision in December, overriding a presidential veto. Also in December, lawmakers approved a new tax code designed to combat tax fraud and evasion.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The current government has taken numerous steps to improve transparency, including the online publication of more information about state operations and finances; it generally adheres to legal guarantees of public access to information. However, many individual officeholders fail to comply with asset-declaration rules. During 2022, the government approved an electronic platform for public acquisitions, an action plan for open government, a new statute for the Court of Accounts, and a strategic plan to combat money laundering.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 54 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Press freedom is guaranteed by law and generally respected in practice, though Article 105 of the electoral code prohibits media organizations from disseminating opinions on or criticism of parties and candidates after a certain date during a campaign period.

Publicly and privately owned media outlets are largely free of government control. However, precarious finances at many outlets can undermine journalists' job security and their ability to undertake investigative reporting projects. A lack of funding has contributed to the closure of several privately owned newspapers, decreasing the diversity of information in the print sector.

In early 2022, three journalists came under criminal investigation for "qualified disobedience" after allegedly disclosing judicially protected information about a police killing. The journalists' trade union called for an update to the relevant law to clarify the relationship between press freedom and judicial secrecy.

The constitution establishes the separation of church and state, though the Roman Catholic Church receives some privileges, such as the recognition of Catholic marriages under civil law. While all religious groups are required to register with the Justice Ministry to obtain tax and other benefits, the process is not restrictive, and there are no limitations on freedom of worship.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected, and the educational system is not affected by political indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on individuals' freedom of expression. The government is not known to engage in online surveillance or improper monitoring of personal communications. Social media are widely used to express private and political opinions.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is legally guaranteed and observed in practice.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely in the country, focusing on a variety of social, economic, environmental, and cultural issues. Both international and local organizations are able to monitor prison conditions and other human rights indicators without government interference. Under the new statute for the Court of Accounts that was adopted in 2022, the auditing body will monitor the finances of NGOs that receive government funding.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The constitution protects the right to unionize, and workers may form and join unions in practice. However, the government restricts the right to strike in broadly defined essential industries, and formal collective bargaining is reportedly uncommon in the private sector.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent, though the courts are overburdened, understaffed, and underfunded. During 2022, the courts decreased their case backlog, with 10,160 pending cases remaining in November. The judiciary's goal was to reduce pending cases by half over the course of four years.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Police and prosecutors generally observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. Defense attorneys are provided to indigent defendants. However, due to the limited capacity of the court system, there are often delays in detainees' first hearings before a judge, and many cases are dropped because defendants in detention are denied a timely trial.

Law enforcement officials are sometimes accused of using excessive force, but perpetrators are often investigated and punished by oversight bodies.

Cabo Verde is generally free of major violence or unrest. Nevertheless, violent crime does occur, and street crime, smuggling, and drug trafficking are perceived as consistent problems. The government sought to increase the capacity of law enforcement during 2022, establishing a municipal police force in Sal and reporting on plans to extend the measure to other municipalities.

In 2017, the government permitted the Chinese technology firm Huawei to install surveillance cameras in Praia and three other cities as part of its Safe City project. While observers voiced privacy concerns, the government has maintained its support for the program. In April 2022, the government announced the expansion of the surveillance system to Tarrafal.

Prison conditions are poor and often overcrowded, but the government has been working to improve conditions through steps including changes to legislation, the implementation of a social reintegration program for prisoners, the construction of more cells and bathrooms, and the rehabilitation and expansion of existing facilities.

Gender discrimination is prohibited by law, but wage discrimination and unequal access to education persist for women. The country lacks comprehensive antidiscrimination legislation covering all forms of bias. Immigrants, who make up 2.2 percent of the population, often face discriminatory treatment in accessing documents and employment.

Same-sex relations are not criminalized, and the law protects against employment discrimination based on sexual orientation. However, LGBT+ people are reportedly subject to such discrimination as well as physical violence and verbal or online abuse.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individual freedom of movement is recognized by law, and there are no significant restrictions in practice. People may freely change their place of employment or education.

Property rights are generally respected. The legal framework and government policies are supportive of private business activity, though obstacles such as corruption and legal and bureaucratic inefficiency remain a concern. Small and medium-size businesses are often the main sources of income for families whose members are not directly employed in the public sector.

Personal social freedoms are generally protected, including in matters of marriage and family law. Same-sex marriages are not recognized, however. In recent years authorities have strengthened and enforced laws against rape, domestic abuse, femicide, and sexual abuse of minors, but such violence remains a serious problem, and the public resources dedicated to supporting and protecting victims remain insufficient.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The law prohibits forced labor and other exploitative practices, and the government actively enforces such safeguards in the formal sector. However, a high percentage of the Cabo Verdean labor force continues to work informally.

Immigrant workers who lack employment contracts remain vulnerable to abuses, and children are reportedly exposed to sex trafficking and illegal work in agriculture or domestic service.

The combined economic effects of the war in Ukraine, the COVID-19 pandemic, and recent droughts imposed serious hardship on residents during 2022, threatening their access to affordable food and other supplies. The government declared a social and economic emergency in June, clearing the way for efforts to stabilize food prices and solicit international aid.

Cambodia

Population: 16,800,000
Capital: Phnom Penh
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Cambodia's political system has been dominated by Prime Minister Hun Sen and the Cambodian People's Party (CPP) for more than three decades. While the country conducted semicompetitive elections in the past, the 2018 elections were held in a severely repressive environment. Since then, Hun Sen's government has maintained pressure on opposition party members, independent press outlets, and demonstrators with intimidation, politically motivated prosecutions, and violence.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Members of the opposition continued to face repression during the year; in March, 19 members of the banned opposition Cambodia National Rescue Party (CNRP) were sentenced to between 5 and 10 years in prison on politically motivated charges including incitement and conspiracy. In a separate case, in October, exiled CNRP leader Sam Rainsy was sentenced in absentia to life imprisonment on specious charges related to his political activism.
- June local elections saw the ruling CPP take 80 percent of the vote, while the opposition Candlelight Party won 18 percent. The Candlelight Party's performance in the polls, which were neither free nor fair, was celebrated by leaders of the country's heavily repressed opposition.
- Constitutional amendments that would permit the ruling party to appoint the country's prime minister without parliamentary approval were signed into law in August. The amendments have been widely condemned as an undemocratic attempt to allow incumbent prime minister Hun Sen to eventually name his son, Hun Manet, as his successor.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 5 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

King Norodom Sihamoni is chief of state, but has little political power. The prime minister is head of government, and is appointed by the monarch from among the majority coalition or party in parliament following legislative elections. Hun Sen first became prime minister in 1985. He was nominated most recently after 2018 National Assembly polls, which offered voters no meaningful choice. Most international observation groups were not present due to the highly restrictive nature of the contest.

The bicameral parliament consists of the 62-seat Senate and the 125-seat National Assembly. Members of parliament and local councilors indirectly elect 58 senators, and the king and National Assembly each appoint 2. Senators serve six-year terms, while National Assembly members are directly elected to five-year terms.

In 2018, the CPP won every seat in both chambers in elections that were considered neither free nor fair. Several small, obscure new "opposition parties" ran candidates in the lower-house elections, though many of these were believed to have been manufactured by government allies to suggest multiparty competition.

Local elections held in June 2022 saw the ruling CPP take 80 percent of the vote, while the opposition Candlelight Party won 18 percent. The Candlelight Party's performance in the polls, which were neither free nor fair, was celebrated by leaders of the country's heavily repressed opposition. Prior to the June elections, the CPP held 95 percent of local elected positions.

Election laws permit security forces to take part in campaigns, punish parties that boycott parliament, and mandate a campaign period of 21 days. The laws have been broadly enforced.

The CPP has complete control over the nine seats of the National Election Committee (NEC). In 2018, the NEC sought to aid the CPP's campaign by threatening to prosecute any figures that urged an election boycott, and informing voters that criticism of the CPP was prohibited.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

Cambodia is a de facto one-party state. The main opposition Cambodia National Rescue Party (CNRP) was banned in the run-up to the 2018 elections, and its leaders have been charged with crimes. In late 2021, the opposition Candlelight Party resumed independent operations. After the Candlelight Party won 18 percent of seats in the June 2022 local elections, the government quickly cracked down on its supporters and leaders, again weakening the opposition.

Members of the political opposition, including CNRP members and supporters and a broad range of other political activists, have faced harassment and arrests. In March 2022, 19 CNRP members—including party leader Sam Rainsy and deputy party leader Mu Sochua—were sentenced to between 5 and 10 years in prison on spurious charges of incitement and conspiracy.

In a separate case in October, Sam Rainsy was sentenced in absentia to life imprisonment for purportedly plotting to cede Cambodian territory to a "foreign entity"; the specious charges were based on the opposition leader's 2013 pledge to uphold the land rights of Indigenous Cambodians. Additionally, a yearslong trial against opposition leader Kem Sokha on politically motivated charges of treason concluded in December; the verdict had not been not pronounced before year's end.

The political opposition has been quashed through an ongoing government campaign of harassment, arrests, and convictions of opposition figures, supporters, and perceived supporters, carried out alongside severe restrictions on press freedom, free assembly, and civil society. In the lead-up to the 2018 polls, the Supreme Court banned the main opposition party, the CNRP; several of its members were jailed, and many others fled the country.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The ruling party is not democratically accountable, and top leaders, especially Hun Sen, use the police and armed forces as instruments of repression. The military has stood firmly behind Hun Sen.

The Chinese government, Cambodia's biggest patron, has increasingly come to influence major government decisions. In June 2022, Chinese and Cambodian officials broke ground on a new facility on Cambodia's Ream Naval Base, near Sihanoukville. This new facility is widely believed to be a base for Chinese naval activities, though both the Chinese and Cambodian governments have denied the allegation.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Ethnic minorities, especially those of Vietnamese descent, are regularly excluded from the political process and scapegoated by both the CPP and the opposition. Women make up 15 percent of the National Assembly, but their interests, like those of most citizens, are poorly represented.

Voting is tied to a citizen's permanent-resident status in a village, township, or urban district; this status cannot be easily changed.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Hun Sen has increasingly centralized power, and figures outside of his close circle have little impact on policymaking. Hun Sen's son, General Hun Manet, has been named to several key posts during his father's rule, including that of deputy commander-in-chief of the Royal Cambodian Armed Forces (RCAF). In December 2021, the CPP's central committee unanimously voted to endorse Hun Manet as "future prime minister."

New constitutional amendments signed into law in August 2022 allow the ruling party to select a prime minister without parliamentary approval. The amendments have been widely condemned as an attempt to ensure Hun Manet's dynastic succession to the premiership.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Anticorruption laws are poorly enforced, and corruption is pervasive in public procurement and tax administration, to the benefit of Prime Minister Hun Sen and his family.

Members of the prime minister's family have also allegedly used their positions to keep millions of dollars in assets abroad.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Nepotism and patronage undermine the functioning of a transparent bureaucratic system. A draft access to information law was finalized in 2019, but the government still had not passed the bill by year-end 2022. International information rights groups have criticized the bill, warning it does not meet international standards.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 19 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The government uses lawsuits, criminal prosecutions, massive tax bills, and occasionally violent attacks to harass and intimidate the media. There are private print and broadcast outlets, but many are owned and operated by the CPP.

Since 2017, the government has engaged in an intense crackdown on independent media. In 2018, the Phnom Penh Post, an independent newspaper, was sold to a Malaysian investor with links to Hun Sen, and many of its editors and reporters quit or were fired. The government stripped the licenses of three digital media outlets in March 2022—the Bayong Times, Khmer Cover TV (KCTV), and Cambodia Today—for allegedly "violating journalistic ethics" after they published stories on government corruption.

While progovernment media organizations operate freely, foreign media groups operate with more severe restrictions and in some instances are forced out of the country altogether.

The majority of Cambodians are Theravada Buddhists and can practice their faith freely, but societal discrimination against religious and ethnic minorities persists.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Teachers and students practice self-censorship regarding discussions about Cambodian politics and history. Criticism of the prime minister and his family is often punished.

Open criticism of the prime minister and government by private citizens can result in reprisals, notably during the run-up to elections.

Free expression has been increasingly restricted in recent years. In 2020, the government enacted legislation giving Hun Sen the power to declare a state of emergency that would grant authorities vast powers to conduct digital surveillance, ban assemblies, and ban or limit broadcasting, among other provisions that amounted to virtually unchecked powers. In 2021, dozens of people were arrested for criticizing the government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

Hun Sen has proposed instituting a single internet gateway, which would centralize internet traffic and increase the government's capacity for internet censorship and online surveillance. If adopted, internet users' private speech and personal expression would be drastically limited.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Authorities are openly hostile to free assembly. Gatherings by the banned opposition CNRP are prohibited. Demonstrations related to politics, labor rights, land disputes, and anything else the government considers sensitive are routinely dispersed by security forces, who frequently subject peaceful protesters to threats, excessive violence, and arbitrary detention.

The introduction of a law on "Preventive Measures Against the Spread of COVID-19" and other contagious diseases in 2021 allows the government to "ban or restrict any gathering or demonstration" in order to prevent the spread of COVID-19. Those who violate the law could be subject to lengthy prison sentences and fines of up to 20 million riels ($5,000).

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Activists and civil society groups dedicated to justice and human rights risk violence and typically face state harassment and arrest, as do activists involved in land disputes.

A 2020 report issued by the UN Human Rights Office (OHCHR) in Cambodia found that human rights activists and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are often subjected to undue "interference, intimidation, or harassment" by Cambodian authorities.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1/4

Cambodia has a small number of independent trade unions, and workers have the right to strike, but many face retribution for doing so. Authorities continue to crack down on labor leaders and those who strike.

In 2022, hundreds of NagaWorld casino workers were violently arrested while participating in a strike against their employer. Several of the women arrested during the strike reported being assaulted by security forces. Prominent union leader Chhim Sithar was arrested while striking in January 2022 and held in pretrial detention until March; she was rearrested in November for allegedly violating her bail conditions. She remained in pretrial detention through the end of the year. The strike, which began in December 2021, was ongoing at year's end.

In November 2022, Human Rights Watch (HRW) released a report chronicling how the government has used the threat of the COVID-19 pandemic as a pretext to crack down on independent unions and arrest union members.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is marred by corruption and a lack of independence. Judges have facilitated the government's ability to pursue charges against a broad range of opposition politicians.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are poorly upheld in Cambodia. Abuse by law enforcement officers and judges remains extremely common. Sham trials are frequent, while elites generally enjoy impunity.

Cambodians live in an environment of repression and fear, which has accelerated in recent years as Hun Sen has consolidated power. The torture of suspects and prisoners is frequent.

The work of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC), established to try the leaders of the former Khmer Rouge regime, has brought convictions for crimes against humanity, homicide, torture, and religious persecution against three former Khmer Rouge leaders. The 2018 convictions of Nuon Chea and Khieu Samphan, two surviving leaders of the Khmer Rouge, marked the first time the Khmer Rouge crimes were legally defined as genocide. In September 2022, the ECCC rejected a final appeal from former top leader Khieu Samphan. The ECCC, which Hun Sen never fully supported, concluded in December 2022.

Ethnic minorities, especially those of Vietnamese descent, often face legal and societal discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees the rights to freedom of travel and movement, and the government generally respects these rights in practice.

Land and property rights are regularly abused for the sake of private development projects. Over the past several years, hundreds of thousands of people have been forcibly removed from their homes, with little or no compensation, to make room for commercial plantations, mine operations, factories, and high-end residential developments. Land disputes are common, and security forces typically respond to protests with force.

The government does not frequently repress personal social freedoms, but women suffer widespread social discrimination. Rape and violence against women are common.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Equality of opportunity is severely limited in Cambodia, where a small elite controls most of the economy. Labor conditions can be harsh, sometimes sparking protests and crackdowns. Exploitative working conditions and wage theft are common; in April 2021, numerous garment workers reported that their legally guaranteed severance pay had been withheld.

Cambodia is a country of origin, destination, and transit point for sex and labor trafficking. In its 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department dropped Cambodia to Tier 3, the lowest possible level, noting that while the government continued to prosecute some trafficking cases, credible reports accusing government officials of colluding with labor traffickers were not investigated.

Cameroon

Population: 27,900,000
Capital: Yaoundé
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: President Paul Biya has ruled Cameroon since 1982. His Cameroon People's Democratic Movement (CPDM) has maintained power by rigging elections, using state resources for political patronage, and limiting the activities of opposition parties. Press freedom and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are restricted, and due process protections are poorly upheld. A conflict between security forces and separatists in the Anglophone Northwest and Southwest regions is ongoing and has resulted in widespread civilian deaths and displacements.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Corruption remained a problem. Under pressure from the IMF, financial authorities opened investigations into alleged embezzlement of funds set aside to manage the COVID-19 pandemic in Cameroon. In May, corruption proceedings against the director of the Autonomous Port of Douala were suspended, reportedly at the president's behest, despite clear irregularities in his awarding of service contracts.
- In March, journalist Paul Chouta, known as a strong critic of the government, was kidnapped by unidentified assailants who and beaten, inflicting severe injuries to his face and ear.

- Also in March, a general strike of high school teachers to call for improved working conditions was heavily restricted by the police.
- The conflict in the Anglophone regions wore on, with frequent reports of violence and deaths attributed to both separatists and government forces.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 6 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is the head of state and is directly elected to a seven-year term in a single voting round and may serve an unlimited number of terms. President Paul Biya won a seventh term in the October 2018 presidential election, with 71 percent of the vote in a process characterized by low turnout and a lack of genuine democratic competition. Maurice Kamto of the Cameroon Renaissance Movement (CRM) came in second with 14 percent of the vote. The election was marred by irregularities including unsigned results sheets. Intimidation and fear in the Anglophone regions prevented many from casting their votes.

The upper chamber of Cameroon's bicameral Parliament is the 100-member Senate. Senators serve five-year terms; 70 are elected through indirect suffrage by regional councils, while the remaining 30 are appointed by the president. The 180 members of the National Assembly, the lower chamber, are directly elected in multimember constituencies to five-year terms.

Long-delayed National Assembly elections were finally held in Cameroon in February 2020, together with municipal elections. The CRM refused to put up candidates, though the Social Democratic Front (SDF) participated, as did the National Union for Democracy and Progress (UNDP), which is allied with the CPDM. The CPDM retained its majority, winning 139 of the 167 seats contested. The Constitutional Council invalidated the results in 11 constituencies of the Anglophone Northwest and Southwest Regions, where boycotts and ongoing tensions resulted in low turnout. Reruns took place in March 2020, and the incumbent CPDM won all 13 of the seats at stake.

The first-ever regional elections took place in December 2020, despite calls for a boycott by opposition parties and threats by separatist groups in the Anglophone regions to arrest would-be voters. Biya's CPDM won the majority.

Partisan election management bodies compromise the independence of Cameroon's electoral system. The majority of the 11 members of the Constitutional Council, which validates election results and adjudicates election disputes, have ties to the ruling party. The council rejected all 18 petitions to cancel the presidential election results filed by opposition parties in 2018, despite credible allegations of fraud and intimidation.

The Elections Cameroon (ELECAM) electoral body was created in 2006 to address concerns about the fair management of previous elections. However, President Biya chooses its members, and CPDM partisans have historically dominated the body. Police shut down a 2021 effort by the leaders of seven opposition parties to draft a new electoral code.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16

The ability to organize in political groups and their freedom to operate is severely limited, and opposition leaders risk arrest and imprisonment. Opposition rallies are frequently prohibited by the government, while CPDM marches in support of President Biya are authorized.

In 2022, several CRM party leaders arrested in September 2020 after a peaceful protest were still facing proceedings at a military tribunal, with potential sentences ranging from five to seven years.

Despite the existence of hundreds of registered political parties, Cameroon remains a one-party state. The organizational advantages of the ruling party's long incumbency, its dominance over electoral bodies, and its superior access to media and public resources disadvantage opposition candidates. Frequent harassment, intimidation, and arrests of opposition figures further reduce the ability of opposition parties to gain power through elections.

Opposition parties—including the two largest, the SDF and CRM—remain highly fragmented, preventing any one of them from becoming a viable alternative to the ruling CPDM. In June 2022, an internal reshuffle carried out by the SDF chairman created two opposing internal groups. Within the CRM, one of the leaders and main activists, Alex Nguepi, was excluded from the party following an internal election.

State patronage and President Biya's control of high-level appointments help the CPDM retain power.

Insecurity in the Anglophone regions caused by violence between armed militants and the military made voting nearly impossible in the 2018 presidential election. The Anglophone crisis also affected the 2020 parliamentary, municipal, and regional elections, contributing to very low turnout.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Groups advocating for greater self-determination in the Anglophone regions remain marginalized and excluded from political debate. LGBT+ people, some ethnic minorities, and women are generally excluded from positions of political influence, and their interests are poorly represented by elected officials.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

President Biya has extensive executive authority, including wide-ranging appointment powers and strong control over state institutions. Many policies are instructed by the government and adopted by presidential decree, with minimal involvement of the parliament. When involved, Parliament often shows little independence and largely acts as a rubber stamp for the president's policy initiatives.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is systemic and bribery is commonplace in all sectors, despite anticorruption initiatives and the presence of the National Anticorruption Commission (CONAC). Several former high-level government officials are in prison for corruption allegations, though these efforts are often perceived as moves by President Biya to sideline political adversaries. Individuals convicted of crimes have been released by seemingly arbitrary clemency decisions, and corruption charges at times are similarly dropped despite evidence of wrongdoing. In 2022, proceedings against the director of the Autonomous Port of Douala were suspended, reportedly at the president's behest, despite clear irregularities in his awarding of service contracts.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Decisions, especially those made by presidential decree, are often adopted without public consultation. Cameroon lacks an access to information law, and it is difficult to access government documents or statistics. The websites of most ministries do not provide substantial information. Despite the existence of a minister dedicated to public procurement, the process is typically opaque. A constitutional article regarding asset declaration by the president and senior officials offers no means to assess their wealth when entering and leaving office.

In 2022, financial authorities opened investigations into alleged embezzlement of funds set aside to manage the COVID-19 pandemic in Cameroon. The development came after the International Monetary Fund (IMF), citing alleged mismanagement, called for an independent audit of the agency in charge of pandemic spending.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 9 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Independent and investigative journalists continue to face serious pressure including risk of attack or detention. In March 2022, journalist Paul Chouta, known as a strong critic of the government, was kidnapped by unidentified assailants who assaulted him and left him with severe injuries to his face and ear.

The National Communication Council (CNC), a media regulatory body, has a history of harassing journalists. Throughout 2022, several journalists received sanctions including temporary suspensions ordered by the president of the CNC. State-run Cameroon Radio Television (CRTV) has been criticized for favoring the CPDM in its coverage. The government continued to suppress media coverage of the Anglophone crisis in 2022.

Religious freedom is somewhat restricted in northern areas affected by the presence of the Boko Haram extremist group, which has carried out violent attacks against places of worship. In addition, random attacks against believers and religious facilities in connection with the conflict in the Northwest and Southwest Regions are common.

There are no legal restrictions on academic freedom, but state security informants operate on university campuses and academics can face negative repercussions for criticizing the government or discussing its political opponents. In September 2021, military security forces detained and tortured Fridolin Nke, a university professor who had recently published a book criticizing the Biya government. In April 2022, Messanga Nyamding, a professor, faced threats after he publicly accused several high-level officials of embezzling of public funds. Nyamding first lost his academic position at the International Relations Institute Cameroon (IRIC), and was expelled from the CPDM, of which he had been a member.

Academic freedom continues to be severely impacted by the crisis in the Anglophone regions, with separatists enforcing a boycott of schools and carrying out acts of violence against teachers and students.

Public criticism of the government and membership in opposition parties can have negative consequences on professional and career advancement. In general, Cameroonians avoid discussing sensitive political issues for fear of reprisals. Such topics include the potential return to a federal system that would grant the Anglophone regions more autonomy.

E. ASSOCIATION AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is subject to significant restrictions. Authorities continued to ban and violently disperse events perceived as antigovernment in 2022, especially those initiated by the opposition CRM.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

The influence of civil society is weak, with many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) relying entirely on foreign assistance, and others coopted by the regime. Anglophone activists have faced harassment, violence, and arrest for their activities. LGBT+ organizations have also been targeted by law enforcement.

The government has restricted the work of international NGOs, denying them access to the country. This includes even medical operations such as Doctors Without Borders (MSF), which was forced to withdraw from the Northwest Region in August 2021. In 2022, the Ministry of Defense issued a press release on "false allegations" of a report published by Human Rights Watch that August. The report provided evidence of the execution of civilians, looting, arbitrary detention, and other severe abuses committed by security forces between April and June 2022 in the Northwest Region.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Trade unions and collective bargaining are legally permitted, although unions are still subject to numerous restrictions when exercising their rights. Strikes are theoretically permitted, but in practice, the government has used force to disrupt them. In March 2022, a general strike of high school teachers to call for improved working conditions was heavily restricted by the police.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is subordinate to the Ministry of Justice, and corruption and political influence weakens the courts. The president appoints judges and can dismiss them at will. Prosecutors have been pressured to stop pursuing corruption cases against certain high-profile officials.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Due process rights are poorly upheld. Lengthy pretrial detentions are commonplace. Civilians accused of terrorism are frequently not afforded the right to a fair trial. French legal norms are regularly imposed upon Cameroonians in Anglophone regions. Acts of violence against lawyers continue to be reported. The government has also invoked charges of terrorism and insurrection against opposition leaders and separatist supporters, and they are often detained in the absence of due process and without realistic avenues for challenging their detention.

In 2022, active conflicts involving both Boko Haram and Anglophone separatists continued to threaten the security of millions of people and have forced large numbers of people to flee their homes. As of December 2022, the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs estimated that there were over 600,000 internally displaced persons (IDPs) in the Northwest and Southwest Regions. Likewise, the Far North Region crisis has internally displaced some 385,000 people as of December 2022.

Prison conditions are harsh, marked by extreme overcrowding and poor sanitation. Inmates often face a lack of access to food, water, and medical care. Police brutality remains a problem, including the abuse and torture of detainees.

Discrimination against Anglophone Cameroonians and individuals from certain ethnic groups, including the Bamiléké, is common. The government imposes the French language in Anglophone regions, and Anglophone Cameroonians are frequently denied senior jobs in the civil service.

Discrimination against LGBT+ individuals is rife, and violence against them is common. The penal code forbids same-sex relations; those convicted face prison sentences as long as five years. A cybercrime law punishes those who solicit same-sex relations online with two-year prison sentences. People are frequently prosecuted under draconian anti-LGBT+ laws on suspicion that they are gay.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Free movement is severely limited in parts of the Far North Region due to Boko Haram activity, and in the two Anglophone regions due to the ongoing crisis. The latter has exacted a heavy toll on children, many of whom have been deprived of their right to education. Thousands of schools have closed, and attacks and kidnappings of students and teachers were frequent throughout 2022. In April, separatists launched an attack at the University of Bamenda's campus in Bambili, in the Northwest Region, injuring at least five people.

Harassment of small business owners by state agents is common. Agribusinesses and logging operations are often carried out without consulting local inhabitants. In many regions, women are still dispossessed of their inheritance rights.

Powerful individuals have effectively evicted people from their homes as part of large land purchases. These properties typically have dubious land titles, often granted with the complicity of administrative authorities.

The constitution guarantees equal rights to men and women, but traditional legal values and practices often take precedence, and do not always provide women with full rights. The Boko Haram conflict has exacerbated the already prevalent practice of child marriage and the sexual abuse of minors in the Far North Region. Customary law can allow rapists to escape punishment if they marry their victim. Despite laws guaranteeing equal rights to men and women to file for divorce, in practice courts often disadvantage women by making proceedings prohibitively expensive or lengthy. Cases of domestic violence and rape are widespread, and perpetrators are rarely prosecuted.

Cameroon remains a source, transit, and destination country for forced labor and sex trafficking of children, as well as a source country for women who are subject to forced labor and prostitution in Europe. Child labor remains common, and child workers are frequently exposed to hazardous working conditions.

Women and children, who make up 60 percent of IDPs, have been the most affected by internal displacement driven by the Anglophone crisis and have been exposed to sexual violence and lack access to job opportunities and education.

Canada

Population: 38,800,000
Capital: Ottawa
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Canada has a strong history of respect for political rights and civil liberties, though in recent years citizens have been concerned about laws relating to the administration of elections, government transparency, the treatment of inmates in prisons, and restrictions on public sector employees wearing religious symbols. While Black, Indigenous, and other marginalized Canadians still face discrimination and economic, social, and political challenges, the federal government has acknowledged these problems and made some moves to address these issues.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In March, the New Democratic Party (NDP) agreed to govern in alliance with the Liberal Party. As part of the agreement, the Liberals promised to amend the Elections Act. Specifically, the agreements says that the parties will work towards reforms such as extending the number of days that voting stations are open, allowing voters to cast a ballot at any polling station in their electoral district, and improving how mail-in ballots are processed. If such amendments are passed, voting in Canadian federal elections will become significantly easier and it is possible that participation in elections will increase.

- Two initiatives began during the year that mark important progress on equal rights for Indigenous and LGBT+ people. In January, the federal government outlawed conversion therapy in Canada and introduced the 2SLGBTQI+ Action Plan, a policy brief to further strengthen equal rights for LGBT+ people. In June, Bill C-29 was introduced in the House of Commons to establish a National Council for Reconciliation, which will monitor the federal government's efforts to ensure equal rights and justice for Indigenous people.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The British monarch is head of state, represented by a ceremonial governor general, currently Mary Simon, who is appointed on the advice of the prime minister. Simon is the first Indigenous governor general and has made reconciliation between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians a major theme of her tenure. The prime minister is the head of government and is invited to the post by the governor general after elections; the office is usually held by the leader of the majority party or governing coalition in Parliament. Justin Trudeau remained prime minister after the Liberal Party maintained control of government in the 2021 federal elections.

The Canadian parliament consists of an elected 338-member House of Commons and an appointed 105-member Senate. Lower-house elections are held every four years on fixed dates; though early elections may be called by the governor general if the government loses a no-confidence vote, or on the advice of the prime minister. In August 2021, Prime Minister Trudeau called for snap elections to be held the following month. There were almost no changes in the number of seats held by parties in Parliament in the September vote: the center-left Liberal Party won 160 seats in the House of Commons and maintained its minority government; the Conservative Party took 119 seats; the Bloc Québécois secured 32 seats; the left-leaning New Democratic Party (NDP) won 25 seats; and the Green Party won 2. In March 2022, the NDP and the Liberals announced a "supply and confidence agreement" that will allow the Liberals to govern with the parliamentary support of the NDP until 2025.

Electoral laws are generally fair and well enforced by the relevant bodies. Some critics expressed concern about the 2014 Fair Elections Act, arguing that its stringent voter identification requirements placed Indigenous Canadians and Canadians from vulnerable groups at a disadvantage. In 2018, the Liberal government passed legislation that relaxed some of the criticized provisions; restricted spending by political parties and other actors during elections; gave voting rights to all Canadians living abroad; improved the privacy of voters' information within the databases of political parties; and increased the power of the commissioner of Canada Elections to investigate violations of election rules. It further bans foreign donations for partisan campaigns and requires major online platforms, such as Facebook and Google, to create a registry of digital political advertisements.

The Liberal government proposed a law in 2021 that would allow voting on the weekend prior to election day, increase options for mail-in ballots, and create special procedures to facilitate voting for seniors in long-term care and for persons with disabilities. However, the snap September elections prevented the bill from proceeding before year-end. In March 2022, as a stipulation of the agreement between the NDP and the Liberals to govern in alliance, the Liberals promised to amend the Elections Act. Specifically, the agreements says that the parties will work towards reforms such as extending the number of days that voting stations are open, allowing voters to cast a ballot at any polling station in their electoral district, and improving how mail-in ballots are processed. If such amendments are passed, voting in Canadian federal elections will become significantly easier and it is possible that participation in elections will increase.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

A small number of parties have historically dominated elections. However, Canadians are free to organize in different political parties, and the system is open to the rise and fall of competing groups. A total of 21 political parties were registered in the 2021 federal elections.

Opposition parties have a realistic chance of gaining power through elections. In 2015, the Conservatives lost power to a Liberal majority government, and in 2019 and 2021, the Liberal Party's control of Parliament diminished to a minority government.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination by actors that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Members of religious minorities and Indigenous people are seated in the parliament, as are many women. Further, Prime Minister Trudeau's cabinet has full gender parity, though women make up only 30 percent of the House of Commons. The rights and interests of LGBT+ people are protected. In January 2022, a law came into effect to ban conversion therapy in Canada, and the federal government introduced its first 2SLGBTQI+ Action Plan, a policy brief to further strengthen equal rights for LGBT+ people.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Canada's freely elected head of government and its legislature cooperate to determine policy. All emergency powers for the federal finance minister to spend money on pandemic-related measures without parliamentary approval that were granted in 2020 have now expired.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Canada has a reputation for clean government and a record of vigorous prosecution of corruption cases.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Canadians may request public information under the provisions of the Access to Information Act, but they may face delays or excessive costs. A law amending the act to improve this situation was passed in 2019, but critics have charged that it has not been very effective, and Canadian journalists have started campaigns to press the government to improve the system. While the federal government currently has no plans to make further reforms, reports from September 2022 claim a House of Commons committee plans to study the issue.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 58 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Canada's media are generally free; journalists are mostly protected from violence and harassment in their work and express diverse viewpoints.

The Canadian constitution and other legislation protect religious freedom. However, in 2019, the Quebec provincial government passed Bill 21, which bans certain government employees in positions of authority from wearing religious symbols such as a hijab, crucifix, turban, or kippah while at work. The list of such persons includes judges, police officers, government lawyers, and teachers. The bill has a grandfather clause for government employees already wearing symbols—they can keep wearing them until they change institutions or take a promotion. The law remained in place at the end of 2022.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion in Canada is generally free and unrestrained.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected and generally upheld in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely and frequently inform policy discussions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions and business associations enjoy high levels of membership and are well organized.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Canada's judiciary is generally independent.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Constitutionally protected due process rights are generally upheld in practice.

The use of solitary confinement for extended periods of time in Canada's prisons has been controversial. While there have been changes in recent years to solitary confinement laws, an advisory panel report released in May 2021 found that the length of solitary confinement and the frequency of its use had not substantially changed. Despite continued pressure, the federal government has not publicized plans to change solitary confinement laws and procedures.

Governments in Canada have made increasing efforts to enforce equal rights and opportunities for minority groups, although problems persist. Black and Indigenous Canadians remain subject to widespread discrimination, struggle with food insecurity, and have unequal access to education, health care, public services, and employment. While there has been some recent progress on these issues, it has been slow.

The federal government's 2015 Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (TRC) and its 2019 National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls (MMIWG) —which concluded that the history of state discrimination and oppression of Indigenous people amounted to genocide—made several recommendations to improve the lives of Canada's Indigenous peoples. An analysis that was last updated in July 2022 found that only 13 out of 94 TRC calls to action had been completed. In June, Bill C-29 was introduced in the House of Commons to establish a National Council for Reconciliation that will monitor progress on the completion of the TRC's calls to action and suggest areas where governments improve their efforts to ensure equal rights and justice for First Nations people. Though the government's response to the MMIWG was delayed due the COVID-19 pandemic, it has now committed C$2.2 billion (US$1.7 billion) over five years to implement the Inquiry's recommendations and related programs. Parliament also has also passed a law to implement the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples in Canada. How this new law will impact federal government policies relating to Indigenous people remains to be seen. Finally, the federal government's 2019 antiracism strategy, which included substantial programs to combat anti-Black and anti-Indigenous racism, is now operational.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is constitutionally protected and upheld in practice. All restrictions on Canadian movements over borders and limits on the size of public gatherings related to the pandemic have now been lifted.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Property rights are not constitutionally guaranteed but are generally well protected by law and through the enforcement of contracts.

Canada legalized same-sex marriage in 2005. In March 2021, the House of Commons passed amendments to Canada's assisted suicide laws to remove the eligibility requirement for a person's natural death to be "reasonably foreseeable," among other changes.

Domestic violence is a problem that disproportionately affects women, particularly Indigenous women, and is underreported. However, there have been initiatives in recent years to better train police in handling domestic violence cases.

There have been some reports of forced labor in the agricultural, food processing, construction, and other sectors, as well as among domestic workers. However, the government, aided by NGOs that work to reveal forced labor and sex trafficking, do attempt to hold perpetrators accountable and to provide aid to victims.

Central African Republic

Population: 5,600,000
Capital: Bangui
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The Central African Republic (RCA) suffers from pervasive insecurity and an absence of state authority in much of the country. A series of peace deals between the government and various armed groups have been repeatedly breached. Violent attacks against civilians, including sexual violence, are an acute risk in many areas. Independent journalists enjoy little support, and workers with nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), particularly aid workers, operate at great personal risk.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In March, Chadian authorities arrested Maxime Mokom Gawaka and handed him to the International Criminal Court (ICC). Mokom, a leader of the antibalaka ("Invincible") group of fighters who targeted Central African Muslims in the early 2010s, was accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity.
- In August, President Faustin-Archange Touadéra announced a constitutional referendum as part of his efforts to seek a third term. In September, the Constitutional Court ruled that the creation of a drafting committee was unconstitutional; Touadéra dismissed court chief Danièle Darlan by decree in October.
- In September, the ICC opened the trial of Mahamat Said Abdel Kani for war crimes and crimes against humanity. Said had led the Séléka ("Alliance") rebel coalition, which overthrew the government of François Bozizé in 2013.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 3 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is chief of state and is directly elected to up to two five-year terms. Faustin-Archange Touadéra was reelected in December 2020 with 53.1 percent of the vote. In January 2021, the Constitutional Court rejected appeals presented by the opposition and confirmed the election's legality, despite significant electoral flaws.

The election was characterized by delays and voter-registration irregularities, and was held following more than a week of intense fighting outside Bangui. While the government and its international partners described the election as credible and legitimate, opposition parties denounced the polls as marred by widespread ballot-box stuffing and vote buying. Many citizens were prevented from voting due to threats and attacks perpetrated by a rebel coalition. There were no international independent observers outside of Bangui.

The prime minister is the head of government and is appointed by the president. In February 2022, Touadéra appointed then economy minister Félix Moloua as prime minister, after the resignation of Henri-Marie Dondra.

Members of Parliament (MPs) are directly elected to five-year terms in the 140-seat National Assembly. The constitution adopted in 2015 stipulated the creation of a Senate, which has not been established.

The first round of legislative elections took place in December 2020 alongside the presidential election, and was plagued by insecurity, voter intimidation, and allegations of fraud. In January 2021, the Constitutional Court nullified some first-round results, citing electoral irregularities, violence, and intimidation. Another three rounds were held to fill the lower house's seats.

The ruling United Hearts Movement (MCU) ultimately won 61 seats. No other party won more than 10. The MCU's parliamentary group expanded to 86 by September 2021 as MPs defected to its banner. According to UN reports, that year's polls were flawed but turnout was high and the elections were largely peaceful.

Repeatedly postponed, local elections are now scheduled for July 2023.

Electoral laws permit multiparty competition, and adult citizens enjoy universal and equal suffrage. However, electoral authorities operate opaquely. A 2020 law regulating the National Elections Authority (ANE) introduced mechanisms to enhance its independence. However, the ruling MCU still controls the ANE's board.

The MCU and its allies made several attempts to amend the constitution during 2022 so that Touadéra could seek a third term. In August, Touadéra notably announced a constitutional referendum and created a committee to draft a new document. In September, the Constitutional Court ruled that the committee's formation was unconstitutional; in response, Touadéra dismissed court chief Danièle Darlan by decree in October.

A government-organized reconciliation initiative made little progress in 2022, with major opposition parties and rebel groups boycotting it in March.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

While political parties are legally able to form and operate, party members conducting political activities risk intimidation and violence by the national police and progovernment militias in Bangui, and by armed groups and security forces outside the capital.

Threats against Touadéra's political opponents increased in 2022 in parallel with initiatives to amend the constitution. Progovernment movements called on supporters to use violence against political opponents.

Several opposition parties hold seats in the National Assembly. However, most of the candidates in the 2020–21 elections were unable campaign outside Bangui due to widespread violence and direct threats and aggression by armed rebel groups.

After the elections, administrative and judicial authorities severely restricted the rights of several prominent opposition leaders, who were prevented from leaving the country and threatened with the loss of their parliamentary immunity. Others have chosen voluntary exile in France for fear of arrest. The government has reportedly considered banning dual nationals from serving as president or as an MP, a move that would affect two prominent opposition figures.

Citizens are vulnerable to pressure and intimidation from national police and nonstate armed groups. Due to enduring insecurity, voters outside Bangui are largely unable to participate in political processes.

The Russian regime maintains significant influence over the RCA's political affairs. President Touadéra assigned his security to the Wagner Group, a Russian security company with links to Russian president Vladimir Putin. Wagner mercenaries have supported military operations and directly fought armed rebel groups, reportedly winning them public support.

In March 2022, Russian diplomat Yevgeny Migunov told then Constitutional Court chief Darlan that the presidential term limit must be changed. Diplomats from Western countries later claimed that Moscow had called for the constitutional referendum announced in August.

In 2021, the European Union sanctioned the Wagner Group, citing serious human rights abuses and destabilizing activities in the RCA. In March 2022, Michelle Bachelet Jeria, then the UN high commissioner for human rights, accused security forces and the Wagner Group of engaging in human rights violations.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Members of many ethnic, religious, and other minority groups are prevented from achieving political representation due to discrimination and an accompanying lack of access to the political process. Sectarian violence against Muslims affects their ability to participate in public space.

Women are underrepresented in politics, with only 18 women sitting in the 140-seat National Assembly, though the electoral law passed in 2019 requires that 35 percent of candidates be women. Societal and legal discrimination against LGBT+ people prevents them from advocating for their interests via the political process.

Due to the long-lasting tribalization of politics, the country's public institutions and army are dominated by the Gbaya ethnic majority, to which former president Bozizé belongs. President Touadéra has promoted members of his group, the Mbaka-Mandja, to key positions and to the presidential guard.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

While elected representatives can determine the policies of the government, their ability to implement policy is severely affected by poor governance and a lack of authority outside Bangui. Local decision-making is also impacted by Russian influence.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption and nepotism have long been pervasive in government. Political will to address public-sector corruption is lacking.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government operations are largely nontransparent, and civil society groups and others have limited opportunity to influence impending policy decisions. Citizens outside of Bangui have limited access to their MPs. Touadéra and his inner circle pursued constitutional reform without consulting MPs or the wider public.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Add Q. Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? −1 / 0

Targeted religious- and ethnic-based violence perpetrated by the Central African Armed Forces (FACA) and Russian mercenaries increased after the 2020–21 elections in the east and northwest. Hundreds of thousands of civilians remain internally displaced or confined to ethnic and sectarian enclaves.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 4 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

There is little support for independent media. In Bangui, outlets are increasingly aligned with national politicians and foreign governments, especially Moscow. Media outlets and social media channels often carry material meant to incite hate, discrimination, or violence, mainly against minority groups and opposition leaders. Although the High Commission of Communication plays an active role in media regulation, the situation has not improved.

Security and progovernment militia forces regularly threaten journalists. The government prevents international media workers from traveling outside Bangui. Incidents of harassment and intimidation by government forces often go unreported for fear of reprisals.

In February 2022, journalist Jean Saint-Clair Maka Gbossokotto died after meeting an individual affiliated with the RCA government and the Wagner Group; friends feared Gbossokotto was poisoned. In September, Communications Minister Serge Ghislain Djorie threatened to close Radio Ndékèluka if it continued to discuss Touadéra's efforts to amend the constitution.

While the RCA is officially secular, ethnic and religious cleavages often overlap with the country's political divisions. Muslims and Christians in Bangui remain partially segregated in separate enclaves, and fears of identity-based or sectarian violence by armed actors impede free religious expression. Muslims living in the northwest and east are targeted by FACA and Russian mercenary forces.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Although extremely dysfunctional, the educational system is generally free of extensive political indoctrination. However, clientelism and corruption are widespread in many schools and universities. Russian-language studies were expanded at the university level in 2021, as Moscow continued to exert influence in the RCA. In June 2022, Moscow issued scholarships to provide Russian-language training to Central African professors.

Outside the capital, the school year is often disrupted, including by a lack of available teachers and the occupation of school buildings by a variety of armed actors.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4

State authorities surveil public discussion and political debates. Political instability and the growing risk of violent retaliation for discussing sensitive topics—including widespread abuses perpetrated by progovernment militias, FACA forces, and Russian mercenaries—inhibit free expression.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Although freedom of assembly and the right to political protest are constitutionally guaranteed, these liberties are curtailed due to government repression of the opposition in Bangui, and threats posed by armed groups, FACA forces, and Russian mercenaries elsewhere.

With the exception of an opposition rally held in August 2022, only progovernment, pro-Russian, and anti-French gatherings are authorized in Bangui.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 0 / 4

NGO operations are limited by poor security conditions, and aid workers are particularly vulnerable. The International NGO Safety Organization counted 170 security incidents in 2022 involving relief workers; 21 were injured and 8 were abducted.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Trade unions and collective bargaining are permitted, although union organizers are sometimes subject to arbitrary detention or arrest. Small-scale agricultural organizations and cooperatives exist throughout the country, including organizations for women farmers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Courts are generally inefficient and frequently hampered by corruption. The government has limited authority to enforce judicial decisions. Judicial salaries have often gone unpaid. Judicial personnel are often untrained and are reluctant to be deployed outside of the capital.

The Special Criminal Court (CPS), created in 2015, is struggling to fulfill its mandate. The Truth, Justice, Reconciliation and Reparations Commission, created in 2020, has yet to start its work.

The Constitutional Court was subjected to political interference during 2022. In March, a Russian diplomat called on then chief Danièle Darlan to help secure a third term for President Touadéra. In October, Touadéra dismissed Darlan by decree.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Arbitrary detention and lengthy pretrial detention are commonplace, and the justice system has limited presence beyond Bangui. Impunity for violence, economic crimes, and human rights violations are widespread.

National and international courts made some steps in trying those accused of violence. In March 2022, Chadian authorities arrested antibalaka leader Maxime Mokom Gawaka, who was accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity, and handed him to the ICC. In June, a French prosecutor launched a preliminary investigation into whether the France-based Groupe Castel was involved in war crimes in the RCA. In September, the ICC opened the trial of former Séléka leader Mahamat Said Abdel Kani. In October, three rebels who had been accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity were found guilty at the CPS.

F3. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

In Bangui, the officials of the Central African Office for the Repression of Banditry and progovernment militias are often accused of abuse of power and excessive use of force. Elsewhere, armed nonstate actors operate with impunity. These groups are responsible for violent attacks against civilians, international peacekeeping forces, and humanitarian workers. FACA and Russian mercenary forces have also been accused of human rights violations.

Security forces and insurgent groups compete to control territory and natural resources, causing widespread internal displacement. Conflicts between farmers and nomadic pastoralists have also destabilized the country.

In July 2022, the UN Security Council exempted the RCA's security forces from an ongoing arms embargo.

Same-sex activity is illegal, and punishable by fines and imprisonment. While enforcement of these laws is uncommon, societal discrimination against LGBT+ people remains acute. In September 2022, the interior minister expelled two Cameroonian nationals for engaging in same-sex activity.

Muslims, nomadic pastoralists, and the Ba'aka minority group face continued discrimination. The Gbaya majority, to which former president Bozizé belongs, is also targeted, while the Mbaka-Mandja are favored by Touadéra.

The independent High Authority for Good Governance is tasked with protecting the rights of members of minority groups and people with disabilities, though its reach is limited.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 0 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Free movement is inhibited by insecurity and targeted violence. Transportation routes are threatened by banditry and theft in many areas.

The UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs reported there were 518,000 internally displaced persons as of November 30, 2022.

Businesses and homes are regularly looted or extorted by armed militants, with little prospect for compensation or legal recourse for victims. The agricultural economy—the livelihood of the majority of the population—remains restricted by ongoing violence and insecurity.

The family code does not discriminate against women regarding their inheritance rights. However, in practice, the possibility for women to inherit faces many challenges, including eviction from the family home after the death or disappearance of men during conflict.

Women and girls are by far the primary victims of sexual violence, but men and boys are also affected. Sexual violence is used as a deliberate tool of warfare; attackers enjoy broad impunity. Such acts that are not related to ethnic conflict are most often perpetrated within communities by family or neighbors. Constitutional guarantees for women's rights are rarely enforced, especially in rural areas. Allegations of sexual abuse committed by UN peacekeeping forces in the country have also been documented.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Economic opportunity is heavily restricted by widespread corruption and the presence of armed groups. Many armed groups exploit gold and diamond mines, and forced labor and child recruitment for soldiering are common practices.

In its Trafficking in Persons Report 2022, the US State Department reported that Central African authorities did not provide sufficient services for survivors, nor did they finalize antitrafficking legislation. However, prosecutors secured the first trafficking-related conviction in five years.

Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The death of longtime president Idriss Déby Itno in 2021 triggered a military coup that installed his son, Mahamat Idriss Déby, as a transitional president. The junta announced that it would oversee an 18-month transition period. In 2022, Déby organized a so-called Sovereign Inclusive National Dialogue (DNIS) that extended the transition by two years. Opposition to Déby's continued rule has generated massive protests by political and civil society activists, who in turn have faced violence, imprisonment, torture, and intimidation at the hands of security forces. Presidential elections have historically been characterized by a high degree of repression, and legislative elections have been routinely delayed. Multiple insurgencies led by rebel factions in the north and the Islamist extremist group Boko Haram in the south continue to threaten physical security.

- In March, the military government and dozens of armed opposition groups began mediated negotiations in Doha, Qatar. More than 40 of the factions signed a peace agreement with the government in August.
- The DNIS that began in August included Doha signatories as well as prominent political, social, religious, and labor groups. While several participants later pulled out, the dialogue concluded in October with a decision to postpone elections for another two years, officially disband the military junta, and retain Déby as president of a new transitional government. The plan also called for a new constitution that would be approved by referendum.
- On October 20, the date originally set by the junta for a return to elected civilian government, security forces violently suppressed public protests, resulting in more than 100 deaths, according to some estimates. A curfew was imposed in major urban areas, and a three-month ban on political activities was imposed the following day. Security forces continued to target the opposition with detentions and harassment later in the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

President Idriss Déby Itno seized power in 1990 during a rebellion and officially won all subsequent elections. These elections were not credible or free, taking place amid government crackdowns on political dissent. Following Déby's April 2021 death, a Transitional Military Council (CMT) headed by his son, General Mahamat Idriss Déby Itno, took control of the country in a coup d'état.

The CMT announced that it would oversee an 18-month transition culminating in elections. To gain support from armed opposition groups, the council in 2022 organized negotiations hosted by the Qatari government, which lasted from March to August. Those talks were followed by the DNIS with civilian representatives, which concluded in October with a new transition timeline that envisioned elections in two years. The CMT formally disbanded, and Mahamat Déby remained in position as president of a new transitional government. He appointed a former political opposition leader, Saleh Kebzabo, as transitional prime minister.

Prior to the April 2021 military coup, the unicameral National Assembly consisted of 188 members elected to four-year terms. Elections were last held in 2011, having been repeatedly postponed. At the time of the coup, legislators were performing their functions despite the expiration of their electoral mandates.

The CMT dissolved the National Assembly and in September 2021 appointed a 93-member National Transitional Council (CNT) as an interim legislature. While some opposition members were named to the body, members of a prominent opposition coalition that denounced the coup were excluded. In October of that year, the former president of the National Assembly, Haroun Kabadi, was appointed as president of the CNT. In November 2022, Déby issued a decree to name 104 additional deputies to the CNT.

Before the April 2021 coup, elections were managed by the Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI); the CENI's leadership was appointed by the country's entrenched political class through the National Framework for Political Dialogue (CNDP), and civil society was excluded from the process.

The CMT, which suspended the constitution upon taking power, violated constitutional provisions requiring that executive authority be passed to the president of the National Assembly should the head of state die in office. In October 2022, the DNIS established a new two-year transition timetable that was to include a new electoral code and a referendum on a new constitution.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

There are more than 130 registered political parties in Chad, though most have historically been aligned with the ruling party of former president Déby, the Patriotic Salvation Movement (MPS). Opposition parties have legal recognition, and some members are represented in the transitional government and legislature. However, opposition parties remain subject to government harassment, intimidation, and arrest. During 2022, the authorities arrested leaders of prominent opposition groups following demonstrations against the junta and used violent repression to disperse and intimidate political activists. After the October protests, the government issued a curfew for major urban areas and a three-month ban on political activities.

Chad has never experienced a peaceful rotation of power through elections, and repeated delays in holding elections have denied opposition groups an opportunity to compete with incumbent forces. After the October 2022 protests against the new two-year transition period, security forces continued to target the opposition and their headquarters with detentions and harassment. The opposition claimed that hundreds of their supporters had been detained or disappeared by year's end.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Extensive kinship networks tied to former president Déby had resulted in a concentration of political and economic power. The former government was not accountable to voters in practice, and citizens had few effective means of influencing politics. After the military, led by Déby's son, took control in 2021, it suspended the constitution, perpetuating a historic pattern of military interventions in political affairs. The two-year extension to the transitional period in 2022 further postponed any shift toward electoral politics and voter participation.

The transitional leadership has continued a long-standing practice of appointing members of the Beri or Zaghawa ethnic group to prominent positions within the government, causing resentment among the country's other ethnic groups. The Beri make up less than 5 percent of Chad's population. Many ethnic groups from the south have been largely excluded from political power; while some have held government posts, they had little ability to advocate for their communities or act independently from the MPS structure.

Women have historically held few senior positions in government, and they face societal discrimination. LGBT+ people are severely marginalized, with minimal space for engagement in political processes or advocacy for their interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

None of the executive or legislative officials installed since the 2021 coup have been elected. Even before 2021, the president was not freely elected, and the mandate of the National Assembly had expired in 2015.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption, bribery, and nepotism are endemic in Chad. Journalists, labor leaders, and religious figures have faced harsh reprisals for speaking out about corruption, including arrest, prosecution, and expulsion from the country. Corruption charges against high-level officials that do go forward are widely viewed as selective prosecutions meant to discredit those who have fallen out with or pose a threat to the government or its allies. The arrest of top executives within Chad's oil sector in June 2022 raised suspicions of such politicized enforcement.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Chad has no law establishing the right to access official information. Since seizing power, Mahamat Déby has largely ruled by decree, offering no meaningful opportunity for civil society to comment on government policies or obtain basic information about government operations.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 14 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 12

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The CMT's transitional charter provides for freedom of the press, but press freedom is restricted in practice. Newspaper editors are legally required to have completed at least three years of higher education; outlets employing editors who do not meet this condition face suspension, constraining the media environment. Although criticism of the government is permitted within certain boundaries, reporters and editors commonly self-censor to avoid reprisals. Journalists can face arrest, detention, and imprisonment on charges including defamation. Several reporters were beaten or temporarily detained while covering opposition demonstrations in 2022; one journalist was fatally shot during the October protests, and another was killed in February as he covered a local conflict in the south.

The state imposes a number of several religious restrictions, primarily against certain Muslim sects. Those deemed to promote violence are banned, despite limited evidence of such activity. Imams are subject to governance by the semipublic High Council for Islamic Affairs, which is led by a group of imams belonging to the Tijanyya Sufi order.

Wearing burqas is banned by ministerial decree, and the government detains individuals who wear them in public.

The government does not explicitly restrict academic freedom, but funds meant for the education system, as well as government-funded stipends, are regularly in arrears, increasing scholars' vulnerability to political pressure or self-censorship. Academic freedom is also affected by broader legal and practical restrictions on antigovernment speech.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

There is some space for personal expression and free private discussion, but residents tend to self-censor due to fears of reprisal from the state. More outspoken activists face harassment, intimidation, arrest, and torture by security forces.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The right of free assembly is not upheld by the transitional government. While some protests denouncing a lack of political transparency and inclusivity were authorized by transitional authorities and allowed to proceed peacefully during 2021, earlier demonstrations against the military coup were met with lethal violence.

Security forces used gunfire, tear gas, and beatings to suppress protests on multiple occasions in 2022. Their response to mass demonstrations on October 20, the date originally set by the junta for a return to elected civilian rule, caused dozens of deaths. Initial government estimates put the toll at about 50 people killed, but opposition leaders and civic groups claimed that more than 100 were killed, and hundreds more were injured and arrested.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) must receive government approval to operate legally, and few such applications are approved. Some NGOs do operate in the country, but they have tended to focus on less politically sensitive issues like humanitarian relief or human trafficking. In November 2022, following the October protests, the authorities banned Wakit Tama—a coalition of NGOs and opposition parties—and forbade any other such civic-political alliances. The coalition's events had faced bans earlier in the year, and a number of its leaders were subjected to arrest and harassment.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Though the CMT's transitional charter protects the rights to strike and unionize, other laws limit public-sector workers' right to strike. Despite such restrictions, some public unions, including the largest civil servants' union, organized strikes in 2022. Union leaders were among the NGO officials who faced arrest during the year for their role in organizing Wakit Tama demonstrations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The political leadership heavily influences the courts, and instances of political interference in trials were reported in 2022. Judges went on strike in September, protesting the condition of their offices and the illegal suspension of salaries for some magistrates.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Security forces routinely ignore legal guidelines regarding search, seizure, and detention. Detained persons are often denied access to lawyers, especially those held in connection with their involvement in antigovernment protests or activities. Many people suspected of committing crimes are jailed for lengthy periods without charge. Instances of arbitrary detention and forced disappearances by security forces were reported throughout 2022.

The security forces have been accused of killing and torturing civilians with impunity. In addition, tensions among ethnic groups have been known to escalate into violent conflict, and did so on multiple occasions in 2022, particularly in the context of disputes over land use.

The Boko Haram militant group, including a faction known as the Islamic State's West Africa Province (IS-WA), operates near Lake Chad and was active throughout 2022. In September, the provincial governor of Hadjer-Lamis held an emergency meeting in response to Boko Haram attacks in Kassalaré and Néra.

Armed opposition groups, most notably the Front for Change and Concord in Chad (FACT) and the Military Command Council for the Salvation of the Republic (CCMSR), threaten the government from bases in southern Libya. While they observed a cease-fire after the launch of the mediated negotiations in Qatar in 2022, key groups including FACT and CCMSR did not sign an agreement with the government at the end of the process. FACT leader Mahamat Mahdi Ali reiterated his group's determination to oppose Mahamat Déby's dynastic succession to the presidency, including through armed struggle.

While there are some legal protections against discrimination based on race, sex, and other categories, none are effectively enforced. Ethnic disparities in the justice system have been reported, with officials refraining from enforcing court orders against people who share their ethnic identity. Arbitrary arrests and detentions based on ethnic identity have also been reported.

Women face pervasive discrimination, and girls have limited access to education. Due to cultural stigmatization, LGBT+ citizens are forced to conceal their sexual orientation and gender identity. The penal code criminalizes same-sex sexual activity.

While discrimination against people with disabilities is legally prohibited, NGOs report that these provisions are not upheld in practice.

As of mid-December 2022, the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs reported that there were nearly 577,000 refugees in Chad, but they generally lack access to government services and rely on international organizations for humanitarian assistance.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

Although legal guarantees for freedom of movement exist, militant activity and government restrictions have limited movement in practice. In some areas of Chad, militants have erected roadblocks, and the security forces periodically close borders with Libya, Sudan, and the Central African Republic due to militant activity in those countries. The Lake Chad Basin region also experiences periodic border closures and official restrictions on movement in response to militant attacks. As of December 2022, such insecurity had contributed to the internal displacement of more than 381,000 Chadians.

Public-resource constraints limit citizens' ability to pursue employment or educational opportunities outside of their home areas, for example by hampering the processing of official documents.

Laws establishing land and property rights are nominally in force, but they are functionally irrelevant to the majority of the country's population due to the state's minimal presence in rural areas; customary law governs land ownership and usage rights in practice. Laws protecting the right of women to inherit land are not enforced.

Establishing and operating a business in Chad is extremely difficult, with obstacles including official corruption.

Violence against women is common, and female genital mutilation/cutting (FGM/C) is illegal but widely practiced. Roughly a third of women aged 15 to 49 have suffered FGM/C. According to the UN Global Database on Violence against Women, which compiles data from various local and international sources, 28.6 percent of women aged 15 to 49 have experienced physical or sexual intimate-partner violence in their lifetime, and 17.5 percent have experienced such violence in the last 12 months. A little more than 60 percent of married women aged 20 to 24 were married before age 18. The penal code bans child marriage, setting the legal age of marriage at 18, but the courts rarely hold those who violate the ban accountable.

The government has adopted minimum wage and occupational safety laws, but they are not well enforced. Many workers are unaware of or lack access to formal channels through which they may seek redress for mistreatment; corruption also impedes workers from obtaining such redress. Unpaid wages are a problem in many sectors.

Chad is a source, transit, and destination country for child trafficking; victims are exploited for forced labor or commercial sex, or recruited into armed groups. NGOs have reported that a large percentage of human trafficking within Chad is related to the operation of illegal gold mines in the north.

Chile

Population: 19,800,000
Capital: Santiago
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Chile is a stable democracy that has experienced a significant expansion of political rights and civil liberties since the return of civilian rule in 1990. Ongoing concerns include corruption and unrest linked to land disputes with Indigenous Mapuche people.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- The Constitutional Convention—elected to draft a new constitution in 2021—published its final proposal in July. In September, 62 percent of voters rejected the progressive constitution proposed by the convention in a national plebiscite.
- A state of emergency imposed in parts of southern Chile in 2021 due to violent conflict between government forces and Indigenous Mapuche activists was extended until March. Newly inaugurated president Gabriel Boric imposed a new state of emergency in the same areas in May due to an increase in conflict-related violence; the state of emergency remained in place through year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Presidential elections in Chile are free and fair. The president is directly elected to a four-year term. Consecutive terms are not permitted. In December 2021, Chileans elected Gabriel Boric to the presidency. Boric, a leftist member of Congress, won the second round of the election with 55.8 percent of the vote, becoming the youngest elected president in Chilean history at age 35. He was sworn into office in March 2022.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The upper house, the Senate, has 50 seats, and the lower house, the Chamber of Deputies, has 155 seats; all members are directly elected. Senators serve eight-year terms, with half up for election every four years, and members of the Chamber of Deputies are elected to four-year terms.

In November 2021, Chileans elected 27 of 50 senators and all 155 members of the Chamber of Deputies. No coalition won a majority of seats, and both chambers remain politically diverse.

Chile's electoral framework is robust and generally well implemented.

A constitutional reform process was triggered by an October 2020 national plebiscite, organized in response to large-scale protests held the previous year. In May 2021, the 155-member Constitutional Convention was elected to draft a new constitution; the body published its final proposal in July 2022. In September, 62 percent of voters rejected the progressive proposed constitution in a national plebiscite. The results of the vote were widely accepted as legitimate.

In December, lawmakers announced that they had reached a multiparty agreement to begin work on drafting a new constitution. The agreement provides for a commission of 24 experts, appointed by Congress, to draft the preliminary text of a new constitution, which will then go to a new, 50-member Constitutional Council—made up of 25 men and 25 women who will be directly elected in mid-2023—to undergo further revision. The agreement remained awaiting congressional approval at year's end. A national plebiscite on adopting the new draft constitution is scheduled to be held in late 2023.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

Chile has a multiparty political system in which parties operate freely. As of 2022, Congress includes representatives from 19 political parties, as well as several independent members.

Power alternation between parties occurs regularly, both in Congress and for the presidency.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People are generally free to exercise their political choices without undue influence from actors that are not democratically accountable. In recent years, however, far-right organizations such as Team Patriota and the Social Patriot Movement (MSP) have sought to influence Chilean politics, reportedly including by trying to exert pressure on conservative politicians.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The Constitutional Convention elected in May 2021 featured gender parity among its 155 members, and 17 seats were reserved for members of Indigenous communities. The Constitutional Council set to be elected in 2023 will also feature gender parity among its 50 members, but does not have a set number of seats reserved for Indigenous representatives.

Women are represented in government, and the electoral system includes a quota for women in the legislature. However, women have reported difficulty gaining influence in intraparty debates. President Boric has made gender parity a core focus of his administration; his first cabinet, announced in January 2022, was made up of 14 women and 10 men. Following changes made within the government in September, Boric's cabinet comprised 15 women and 9 men.

The interests of the Mapuche minority, which represents about 9 percent of the population, are present in political life, with Mapuche activists regularly making their voices heard in street demonstrations. However, this activism has yet to translate into significant legislative power.

Members of the LGBT+ community are organized in civil society organizations but few are elected to political positions.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

While lobbying and interest groups exist and work to shape policy, there is little significant intervention by actors who are not democratically accountable in policymaking processes.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Anticorruption laws are generally enforced, though high-level corruption scandals crop up with some regularity. In March 2022, Ricardo Martínez, then commander in chief of the army, resigned one day before testifying in the so-called Milicogate case, a series of corruption scandals that involved military officers using fake procurement deals to embezzle public funds between 2010 and 2019. In April 2022, Martínez was placed under preventive arrest in relation to the Milicogate investigation; he was indicted on eight fraud charges, but was granted bail soon after his arrest. The military court revoked the indictment in August, and the Supreme Court rejected an appeal against the military court's action later that month.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government operates with relative transparency. In 2009, the Transparency and Access to Public Information Law came into force; it increased public access to information and created a Council on Transparency. Agencies have generally been responsive to information requests.

In 2019, the government replaced the decades-old Copper Law, which was viewed as a major step toward improving transparency in the wake of a series of corruption scandals involving the armed forces. Earlier legislation stipulated that 10 percent of the state-run copper giant Codelco's export sales be channeled to the armed forces without oversight.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Guarantees of free speech are generally respected, though some laws barring defamation of state institutions remain on the books. Media ownership is highly concentrated.

Several journalists reported facing harassment and assault, including by the police, during 2022. In May, three journalists were injured while covering a protest in Santiago, including Francisca Sandoval, who was shot by gunmen who opened fire on the demonstration. Sandoval later died from her injuries, becoming the first journalist to be killed in the line of duty since the Pinochet era.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for religious freedom, and the government generally upholds this right in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally unrestricted in Chile.

Chileans enjoy open and free private discussion.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The right to assemble peacefully has traditionally been respected. However, peaceful protest activity that arose in 2019, when people took to the streets to demonstrate against the government and against societal inequality, was severely disrupted by a variety of factors including people who took advantage of the protest movement's cover to engage in looting, arson, and vandalism; and by widespread police violence and a restrictive state of emergency that was imposed in response to the unrest.

Several protests were held during 2022, including a number of demonstrations against rising inflation and persistent inequality. Though some demonstrations featured violence from both protesters and law enforcement, both civilian violence and police repression have decreased significantly since 2019.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) form and operate without interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

There are strong laws protecting worker and union rights, but some limited antiunion practices by private sector employers continue to be reported.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, and the courts are generally free from political interference.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The right to legal counsel is constitutionally guaranteed and due process generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. However, indigent defendants do not always receive effective legal representation.

Human rights groups and the United Nations have criticized the government's use of antiterrorism laws, which do not guarantee due process, to prosecute acts of violence by Mapuche activists.

While the government has developed mechanisms to investigate and punish police abuses, excessive force and human rights abuses committed by the carabineros (the national police) still occur, and such abuses intensified during the social upheaval that started in 2019. Protests, vandalism, and police use of excessive force occurred sporadically throughout 2022, but did not reach the intensity of the unrest seen in 2019.

The government's National Institute for Human Rights (INDH), Human Rights Watch (HRW), and Amnesty International have accused the carabineros and the military of perpetrating human rights violations during the 2019 protests, including excessive use of force against protesters, as well as torture and sexual abuse of people held in detention. The Boric administration established a police reform commission and a reform advisory unit in August 2022.

Conflict between Indigenous Mapuche people and the Chilean state continued throughout 2022. The unrest reportedly featured growing violence by some Mapuche activists, including the use of arson attacks against landowners and forestry workers. In October 2021, then president Sebastián Piñera declared a state of emergency in the Araucanía and Biobío regions in response to violent clashes between security forces and Mapuche activists. The state of emergency was extended several times until President Boric took office in March 2022. In response to increasing violence and road blockades, President Boric imposed a new state of emergency in the same areas in May; the new state of emergency, which is reportedly more limited in scope than that under Piñera, remained in place through year's end.

Though Chile has one of the lowest rates of violent crime in Latin America, the country recorded an increased level of violent crime during 2022. According to police statistics, the homicide rate grew by more than 32 percent between 2021 and 2022. Violent crime related to drug trafficking is also a concern, particularly in the Tarapacá region.

While Indigenous people still experience societal discrimination and police brutality, their poverty levels have declined somewhat, aided by government scholarships, land transfers, and social spending.

LGBT+ people continue to face societal bias, despite a 2012 antidiscrimination law that covers sexual orientation and gender identity. In 2018, the president signed a gender-identity law allowing for gender identity to be changed on the civil registry.

In practice, elites benefit from systematic favorable legal treatment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The constitution protects the freedom of movement, and the government respects this right in practice. During 2022, freedom of movement was at times impacted by the ongoing conflict between the Mapuche people and the government in parts of southern Chile. Among other things, the continuing conflict saw Mapuche activists put up roadblocks and barricade highways during the year; a state of emergency imposed in May and extended through year's end allowed for the military to guard roads and transit routes in the conflict zone. In November, President Boric announced the creation of a peace and reconciliation commission intended to resolve the conflict, in part by returning some ancestral land to Indigenous communities.

Individuals generally have the right to own property and establish and operate private businesses, and do so without interference from the government or other actors. However, Mapuche activists continue to demand greater territorial rights to land, ancestral waters, and natural resources.

The government generally does not restrict personal social freedoms.

Violence against children and women remains a problem. A law against femicide went into force in 2010. The government reported 43 femicides and 180 attempted femicides in 2022.

In 2017, legislation that decriminalized abortion in the events of rape, an inviable fetus, or danger to the life of the woman took effect.

In 2021, Congress approved same-sex marriage by an overwhelming majority; the law came into effect in March 2022. Previously, a 2015 law recognized civil unions for same-sex couples.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

While compulsory labor is illegal, forced labor, particularly among foreign citizens, continues to occur in the agriculture, mining, and domestic service sectors.

Although there have been improvements in fighting child labor, minors still suffer commercial sexual exploitation and work unprotected in the agricultural sector. There is limited public information about forced child labor.

Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Hong Kong or Tibet, which are examined in separate reports. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology.

Overview: China's authoritarian regime has become increasingly repressive in recent years. The ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP) continues to tighten control over all aspects of life and governance, including the state bureaucracy, the media, online speech, religious practice, universities, businesses, and civil society associations. The CCP leader and state president, Xi Jinping, secured a third term as party leader in October 2022, further consolidating personal power to a degree not seen in China for decades. Following a multiyear crackdown on political dissent, independent nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and human rights defenders, China's civil society has been largely decimated.

- Xi Jinping was appointed to a third five-year term as the CCP's general secretary at the 20th Party Congress in October. The designation, awarded four years after Xi had orchestrated a change in China's constitution to abolish presidential term limits, cleared the way for him to secure a third term as state president in 2023. The CCP also announced the new membership of the Politburo Standing Committee (PSC), which sets government and party policy; all of those on the revamped committee were Xi loyalists and allies.
- In late November the largest protests since 1989 erupted across the nation, triggered by news of an apartment fire that killed 10 people in Xinjiang's regional capital, Urumqi. Strict COVID-19 lockdown rules were widely thought to have prevented the victims from escaping. Protesters criticized Xi's "zero-COVID" policy, which had also caused food shortages and other extreme hardships, and some called for Xi's resignation and democratic reforms. Law enforcement authorities moved quickly, and in some cases violently, to quash the protests.
- The government abruptly abandoned key components of its zero-COVID policy in December, in what was seen as a major concession to demonstrators. Official statements and the state-controlled media sector downplayed the consequences of the policies' cancellation, and sought to portray the move as a well-organized process backed by science. Bloomberg News and the Financial Times reported on leaked documents from top Chinese health officials in which it was estimated that almost 250 million people in China had contracted COVID-19 in the first 20 days of December.
- Authorities continued to develop intense surveillance and mass data-collection systems capable of monitoring individuals' movements, social contacts, online activity, and other behavior, and to draw on these tools to crush dissent.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: −2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

There are no direct or competitive elections for national executive leaders. The National People's Congress (NPC) formally elects the state president for five-year terms and confirms the premier after he is nominated by the president, but both positions are determined in advance by the top CCP leadership and announced at the relevant party congress. The CCP's seven-member PSC, headed by Xi Jinping in his role as the party's general secretary, sets government and party policy in practice. Xi also holds the position of state president and serves as chairman of the state and party military commissions.

Xi was appointed for a third five-year term as CCP general secretary at the 20th Party Congress in October 2022, paving the way for him to remain in power indefinitely. This marked a sharp break from the post–Cultural Revolution practice of maintaining a two-term limit for the country's highest leadership position.

The 3,000 NPC members are formally elected for five-year terms by subnational congresses, but in practice all candidates are vetted by the CCP. Only the NPC's standing committee meets regularly, with the full congress convening for just two weeks a year to approve proposed legislation; party organs and the State Council, or cabinet, effectively control lawmaking decisions. The current NPC was seated in March 2022.

Political positions are directly elected only at the lowest levels. Independent candidates who obtain the signatures of 10 supporters are by law allowed to run for seats in the county-level people's congresses, and elections for village committees are also supposed to give residents the chance to choose their representatives. In practice, however, independent candidates for these posts are often kept off the ballot or out of office through intimidation, harassment, fraud, and in some cases detention.

Elections are not administered by an independent body. The indirect elections that populate people's congresses at various levels are conducted by those congresses' standing committees, while village-level elections are conducted by a village electoral committee that answers to the local party committee.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

The CCP effectively monopolizes all political activity and does not permit meaningful political competition. Eight small noncommunist parties are represented in the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), an official advisory body, but their activities are tightly circumscribed, and they must accept the CCP's leadership as a condition for their existence.

Citizens who have sought to establish genuinely independent political parties or prodemocracy movements are nearly all in prison, under house arrest, or in exile. The authorities continue to hold prodemocracy activists and lawyers in various forms of detention and prison. New Citizens' Movement founder and legal activist Xu Zhiyong, in detention since February 2020, was reportedly tried in secret for "subversion" in June 2022.

China's one-party system provides no institutional mechanism for organized political opposition, and the CCP has ruled without interruption since winning a civil war against the Nationalist Party (Kuomintang) in 1949. While factions within the CCP have always existed, they do not compete openly or democratically, and they remain unaccountable to the public. Xi Jinping has steadily increased his personal power and authority within the party since 2012, notably by purging rivals and challengers as part of an anticorruption campaign.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The authoritarian CCP is not accountable to voters and denies the public any meaningful participation in political affairs. The party uses a broad array of coercive tools and methods to suppress independent political engagement.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The political system is dominated in practice by ethnic Han Chinese men. Societal groups such as women, ethnic and religious minorities, and LGBT+ people have no opportunity to gain meaningful political representation. Nominal representatives of ethnic minority groups such as Tibetans, Uyghurs, and Mongolians hold administrative offices and participate in party and state bodies like the NPC, but their role is largely symbolic. Women are severely underrepresented in top CCP and government positions. For the first time in 25 years no women will sit on China's Politburo, after the 20th Party Congress failed to name any in 2022. No woman has ever sat on the PSC.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

None of China's national leaders are freely elected, and the legislature plays a rubber-stamp role in policymaking and the development of new laws. The continuing concentration of power in Xi Jinping's hands, an expanding cult of personality centered on Xi, and his regular calls for greater ideological conformity and party supremacy have further reduced the limited space for policy debate, even within the CCP.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Since becoming CCP leader in 2012, Xi has pursued an extensive anticorruption campaign. Well over a million officials have been investigated and punished, according to official figures, including senior state, party, and military officials. Anticorruption functions are currently managed by the National Supervisory Commission (NSC), which was established through a 2018 merger of existing state and party entities and is tasked with enforcing political and ideological discipline in addition to compliance with the law. In 2022, anticorruption efforts focused heavily on law enforcement agencies, reflecting both endemic corruption within the police as well as the leadership's effort to secure loyalty within law enforcement.

Nevertheless, corruption remains rooted in the one-party system, which does not tolerate the institutions necessary for effectively addressing graft—such as a free press, independent civil society groups, and impartial courts.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The Chinese government and the CCP are notoriously opaque. Regulations on "open government" do not effectively compel local party and state organs to share critical data or respond to citizen requests. Under Xi Jinping's leadership, the government has developed increasingly sophisticated methods for controlling the diffusion of information and shaping public discourse. In 2022, authorities continued to suppress information about their management of COVID-19, spread disinformation about the pandemic, and punish those who sought to report truthfully about the situation.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? –3 / 0

Chinese authorities have aggressively pursued policies to deliberately alter the demographics of ethnic minority regions, particularly in Xinjiang, Tibet, and Inner Mongolia. Authorities in Xinjiang have interned more than a million Uyghurs and other members of Turkic ethnic minority groups in so-called Vocational Skills Education and Training Centers (VSETCs), as well as in prisons and other detention facilities. While the government claims that VSETCs are educational centers that Uyghurs and others participate in voluntarily, a cache of internal government documents, including speeches and photographs, obtained by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists (ICIJ) and published in 2022 provided further evidence of their coercive and abusive nature. The documents, which date back to 2017, describe facilities secured by armed guards who have been issued shoot-to-kill orders against anyone attempting to escape. Inside, detainees are subject to aggressive forms of indoctrination and political reeducation that aim to undermine their ethnic identities and religious beliefs.

Uyghur and other Muslim women in Xinjiang, particularly those with two or more children, are subject to a program of forced sterilization. Previous investigations and witness testimony have revealed that Xinjiang authorities have coerced women to accept surgical sterilization, forcibly implanted intrauterine contraceptive devices prior to internment, administered unknown drugs and injections to women in detention, and used fines and internment as punishment for birth-control violations.

In 2022, poverty alleviation measures included the coercion of hundreds of thousands of Uyghurs and other ethnic minority members, mostly farmers and other residents authorities refer to as "surplus rural laborers," to leave their hometowns and take low-wage jobs elsewhere, largely in state-owned factories. Participants have described prison-like environments where individuals are subjected to political indoctrination. Despite the government's claim that the relocations are voluntary and to the financial benefit of participants, a UN special rapporteur in a 2022 report cited evidence that the programs involve forced labor, heavy surveillance, violence, and degrading treatment, and that "some instances may amount to enslavement as a crime against humanity.

Increasing numbers of ethnic minority children in Xinjiang and Tibet have been separated from their parents and forced to attend state-run boarding schools, where Mandarin is the sole language of instruction and where students are subject to intense political indoctrination. Those who protest are subject to detention and other forms of punishment. In recent years the Ministry of Education has required preschools across China to make Mandarin Chinese the language of instruction, reflecting an ongoing push to impose Mandarin as the dominant language at all educational levels and further weaken the cultural identities of ethnic minority groups and individuals. A multiyear campaign of detaining ethnic minority writers, scholars, musicians, and religious figures, often meting out long prison terms, continues to damage the cultural, religious, social and economic leadership of these communities.

The government has also continued to promote policies that have attracted hundreds of thousands of Han Chinese to relocate to ethnic minority regions. Programs that encourage marriages between Han Chinese and members of ethnic minorities through financial and other incentives further aim to dilute minority identities.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 11 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 1 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

China is home to one of the world's most restrictive media environments and its most sophisticated system of censorship, particularly online. The CCP maintains control over news reporting via direct ownership, accreditation of journalists, harsh penalties for comments that are critical of party leaders or the CCP, and daily directives to media outlets and websites that guide coverage of breaking news stories. State management of the telecommunications infrastructure enables the blocking of websites, removal of smartphone applications from the domestic market, and mass deletion of social media posts and user accounts that address banned political, social, economic, and religious topics. Thousands of websites have been blocked, many for years, including major news and social media hubs like the New York Times, the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), YouTube, Twitter, and Facebook.

Rules and regulations governing the media and internet usage include measures that restrict news dissemination and contribute to the banning of mobile apps focused on minority languages, Bible content, and foreign-language learning, among other topics. Censors have also removed large numbers of social media groups, accounts, or posts that dealt with LGBT+ issues, financial advice, critical views of CCP history, and celebrities. The country's network of some 20 million pro-CCP volunteer internet commentators and more than 2 million paid employees continued to aggressively monitor and censor online communications.

According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), 43 journalists were imprisoned in China in 2022, though the number of people held for uncovering or sharing newsworthy information is far greater. Numerous citizen journalists and bloggers were detained, disappeared, or criminally charged during 2022 for their reporting and online posts. Zhang Zhan, a citizen journalist and former human rights lawyer, continued to serve a 4-year prison sentence for "picking quarrels and provoking trouble" for her reporting on the COVID-19 pandemic. The whereabouts of many others detained for reporting on the pandemic remain unknown.

The CCP regime operates a multifaceted apparatus to control all aspects of religious activity, including by vetting religious leaders for political reliability, placing limits on the number of religious authorities such as priests and imams, requiring ideological conformity within religious doctrine, and installing security cameras inside religious establishments. All religious groups must go through a rigorous process of certification to be officially recognized by the authorities, with those that refuse to do so being labeled illegal and persecuted. Certain religions and religious groups, including Tibetan Buddhists, Uyghur Muslims, Falun Gong practitioners, and Christian "house churches," are persecuted harshly. In Xinjiang, peaceful religious practices are routinely punished under charges of "religious extremism," resulting in detention, prison sentences, and indoctrination for many Uyghur, Kazakh, and Hui Muslims.

Thousands of Buddhist, Taoist, and folk-religion temples and house churches across China were completely or partially demolished by authorities in recent years. Authorities were reported to have used COVID-19 restrictions and inspections to justify the closure of churches and other religious venues, even as nearby venues like restaurants remained open.

The government continued to operate mobile "transformation" units, which subject members of "illegal" religious groups to severe psychological and physical torture intended to force them to "transform" by renouncing their religious beliefs. Thousands of members of such illegal groups are also sentenced to long prison terms and illegal forms of detention, in which torture and ill-treatment are routine. Children under the age of 18 are prohibited by law from attending church or engaging in religious activities. Dozens of Falun Gong practitioners were reported to have died in custody, or shortly after their release, in recent years.

Academic freedom is heavily restricted. Efforts to police classroom discussions are present at all levels of education, including via installation of surveillance cameras in some classrooms, large-scale recruitment of student informants, and the creation of special departments to supervise the political thinking of teaching staff. The CCP controls the appointment of top university officials, and CCP committees and party branches have significant formal authority over university administration. Many scholars practice self-censorship to protect their careers and personal safety.

Political indoctrination, including the study of "Xi Jinping Thought," is a required component of the curriculum at all levels of education. A number of universities have removed references to "freedom of thought" from their charters, replacing them with pledges of loyalty to the CCP. Professors and students face reprisals—ranging from censored writings, travel restrictions, and demotions to arrest and imprisonment—for expressing views that are deemed critical of the CCP's governance or Xi's leadership. Authorities have continued to shut down or nationalize private schools across the country, in an effort to bring all education under state control.

Citizens continue to be charged and sentenced to sometimes long prison terms for critical or satirical social media posts on a variety of subjects, notably the government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic, and criticism or perceived criticism of Xi or the CCP. In addition to criminal punishment, internet users face account deletions, job dismissals, arbitrary detention, and police interrogation over such posts.

The government's vast ability to monitor citizens' lives and communications inhibits online and offline conversations. Administrators of social media applications like WeChat closely monitor user discussions to ensure conformity with government content restrictions. Surveillance cameras, now frequently augmented with facial-recognition software, cover many urban areas and public transportation, and these networks are expanding into rural regions. Devices used by police to quickly extract and scan data from smartphones, initially deployed in Xinjiang, have spread nationwide.

Police have access to the personal details of broad categories of individuals. China's Cybersecurity Law obliges companies to store Chinese users' data within the country and submit to often intrusive security reviews. Telecommunications companies are required to obtain facial scans of new internet or mobile phone users as part of the real-name registration process, which is combined with mass surveillance tools to closely monitor all residents. Electronic surveillance is supplemented with offline monitoring by neighborhood party committees and "public security volunteers" who are visible during large events.

There is an especially heavy police presence in ethnic minority regions, particularly Xinjiang. The ability of Uyghurs and members of other Muslim minority groups in Xinjiang to express themselves freely, even in private, has been further undermined in recent years by a policy of having Chinese officials live in their homes to monitor and indoctrinate them.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The constitution protects the right of citizens to demonstrate, but in practice protesters seldom obtain approval and risk punishment for assembling without permission. Spontaneous demonstrations have provided some outlet for local grievances, though they are frequently met with police violence and criminal prosecution. Solitary protests—in which an individual holds a placard in public, for example—can be criminally punished. Armed police have been accused of opening fire during past protests, particularly in Xinjiang.

Following widespread spontaneous protests at the end of 2022 against the country's zero-OVID policy—dubbed the "white paper" movement because many participants held up blank pieces of paper, a tactic meant to both evade arrest and implicitly criticize censorship—dozens of protesters were detained, with many reporting abusive interrogation procedures.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Both Chinese and foreign nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) lack meaningful autonomy. While hundreds of thousands of NGOs are formally registered, many effectively operate as government-sponsored entities and focus primarily on service delivery. Nearly all prominent NGOs that focused on policy advocacy, including in previously less politically sensitive areas, have been shuttered under government pressure in recent years.

Engaging in NGO work unsanctioned by the state is risky, and many NGO workers have been detained and jailed. In 2022, it was reported that Cheng Yuan, the founder of an NGO that advocated for the rights of migrant workers and people with chronic health issues and disabilities, had been tortured in prison while serving a multiyear sentence imposed after a secret trial.

The law requires foreign NGOs to find a Chinese sponsor and register with the Ministry of Public Security, and police have the authority to search NGOs' premises without a warrant, seize property, detain personnel, and initiate criminal procedures.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The only legal labor union organization is the government-controlled All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU), which has long been criticized for failing to defend workers' rights. Efforts to organize independent trade unions are swiftly shut down by authorities, and the activists involved face harsh penalties. Despite the risks, workers engaged in a number of largely spontaneous strikes, with over 800 recorded during 2022.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The CCP dominates the judicial system, with courts at all levels supervised by party political-legal committees that have influence over the appointment of judges, court operations, and verdicts and sentences. CCP oversight is evident in politically sensitive cases, and most judges are CCP members. Judges are expected to conform to CCP ideology and uphold the principle of party supremacy over the judiciary. Many judges complain about local officials interfering in cases to protect powerful litigants, support important industries, or avoid their own potential liability.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Violations of due process are widespread in practice. Trials of human rights activists, religious dissidents, and other human rights defenders are routinely held in secret, with even family members being denied information or entry. While adjudication of routine civil and administrative disputes is considered more fair, cases that touch on politically sensitive issues or the interests of powerful groups are subject to decisive "guidance" from party political-legal committees.

Prosecutions rely heavily on confessions, many of which are obtained through torture, despite laws prohibiting such practices. Forced confessions are often televised. An ongoing crackdown on human rights lawyers has left many defendants without effective or independent legal counsel.

Extrajudicial forms of detention remain widespread. The practice of "residential surveillance in a designated location" allows the police to hold individuals in secret detention for up to six months and has been deployed against human rights defenders and lawyers, and government critics.

Conditions in places of detention are harsh, with reports of inadequate food, regular beatings, and deprivation of medical care. In addition to their use to extract confessions, torture and other forms of coercion are widely employed in efforts to force political and religious dissidents to recant their beliefs. Impunity is the norm for police brutality and suspicious deaths in custody. Citizens and lawyers who seek redress for such abuse are often meet with reprisals or imprisonment. Many political and religious dissidents have died in prison or shortly after release due to ill-treatment or denial of medical care. Peaceful protesters are regularly beaten by police or hired aggressors.

The government has gradually reduced the number of crimes that carry the death penalty, though the total was still more than 40 as of 2022. It is estimated that thousands of people are executed each year; the actual figure is considered a state secret. Despite the government's claim that it has ended the transplantation of organs from executed prisoners, the scale and speed of the transplantation industry far exceed what is feasible via the country's nascent voluntary donation system. In June 2021, a group of UN human rights experts expressed alarm over ongoing reports of organs being procured from "minorities, including Falun Gong practitioners, Uyghurs, Tibetans, Muslims, and Christians, in detention in China."

Chinese laws formally prohibit discrimination based on nationality, ethnicity, race, gender, religion, or health condition, but these protections are often violated in practice. Several laws bar gender discrimination in the workplace, and some indicators of gender equality have reportedly improved over the past decade. Nevertheless, bias remains endemic, including in job recruitment and college admissions. Women's rights activists and individuals who campaign against sexual harassment and assault have themselves faced harassment, detention, and in some cases criminal prosecution. In August 2022, Zhou Xiaoxuan lost her landmark case against CCTV host Zhu Jun, whom she had accused of sexual harassment, on the grounds of "insufficient evidence." She had come forward with the allegations in 2018, helping to galvanize the #MeToo movement in China.

Members of ethnic and religious minority groups, LGBT+ people, people with disabilities, and people with illnesses such as HIV/AIDS and hepatitis B also face discrimination in employment and access to education. Members of religious and ethnic minorities are disproportionately targeted and abused by security forces and in the criminal justice system. In addition to being held in extrajudicial detention in larger numbers, members of these groups tend to be sentenced to longer prison terms than Han Chinese convicts. Data has shown showing higher-than-normal unemployment rates for former COVID-19 patients. Propaganda under Xi's leadership has sought to negatively associate LGBT+ individuals with liberal "Western" culture, exacerbating discrimination against them.

Despite China's international obligation to protect the rights of asylum seekers and refugees, law enforcement agencies continue to repatriate North Korean defectors, who face imprisonment or execution upon return.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Prior to the sudden abandonment of the strict zero-COVID policies in late November 2022, following widespread protests, lockdowns in dozens of cities across the country restricted people's movement, and in some cases confining them to their homes or to quarantine centers. The COVID-19 "health code" app, which was in use until late 2022, was reportedly used to restrict peoples' access to air and train travel, medical facilities, and a range of public services and spaces based on arbitrary or opaque criteria. Some individuals reported that they were prevented from attending protests after their health code app suddenly turned from green to red while they were en route to the event, pointing to the government's use of the app to restrict the movements of specific individuals.

While China's constitution gives individuals the right to petition the government concerning a grievance or injustice, in practice petitioners are routinely intercepted in their efforts to travel to government centers, forcibly returned to their hometowns, or extralegally detained.

Despite the government's stated commitment to reforming the hukou (household registration) system, it continues to prevent close to 300 million internal migrants from enjoying full legal rights as residents in the cities where they work.

Police checkpoints throughout Xinjiang limit residents' ability to travel or even leave their hometowns.

Millions of people are affected by government restrictions on their access to foreign travel and passports, with Uyghurs and Tibetans experiencing the greatest difficulty. The authorities continued to use COVID-19 as a justification to restrict overseas travel. Many overseas Chinese nationals who engage in politically sensitive activities abroad are prevented from returning to China, while those who seek refuge abroad often face forced repatriation and arrest.

The authorities dominate the economy through state-owned enterprises in key sectors such as banking and energy, through state ownership of land, and through political and regulatory control. Chinese citizens are legally permitted to establish and operate private businesses. However, all enterprises are vulnerable to political interference, arbitrary regulatory obstacles, debilitating censorship, negative media campaigns, demands for bribes, and other forms of corruption.

An ongoing government crackdown on private businesses, particularly large technology and social media firms, has ostensibly been aimed at curbing monopolistic practices, uncontrolled growth, and other economic ills, but has also brought the private sector more firmly under CCP control. Running a business continues to expose individuals to prosecution and long prison terms. Chinese-Canadian Xiao Jianhua, one of China's richest businessmen, was sentenced to 13 years in prison on bribery and other charges in August 2022, five years after his abduction from a Four Seasons hotel in Hong Kong. Tomorrow Holdings, the investment group he had founded, had been linked to family members of prominent former officials.

Property rights protection remains weak. Urban land is owned by the state, with only the buildings themselves in private hands. Rural land is collectively owned by villages. Farmers enjoy long-term lease rights to the land they work, but they have been restricted in their ability to transfer, sell, or develop it. Low compensation and weak legal protections have facilitated land seizures by local officials, who often evict residents and transfer the land rights to developers. Corruption is endemic in such projects, and local governments rely on land development as a crucial source of revenue.

Following regulatory changes in 2021 allowing couples to have up to three children, out of concern over falling fertility rates, the government in 2022 launched a new campaign instructing local family planning officials to limit the number of abortions, including by discouraging abortions for "nonmedical" reasons. The move was interpreted as a further effort to boost the country's declining fertility rate. While ethnic minority couples were already permitted to have up to three children prior to 2021, in practice ethnic Tibetans as well as Uyghurs and other Muslims in Xinjiang are subject to abusive policies aimed at limiting their reproduction.

Domestic violence continues to affect one-quarter of Chinese women, according to official figures, despite laws criminalizing the behavior. The law does not criminalize spousal rape.

Chinese law defines marriage as the union between a man and a woman, denying marriage rights to same-sex couples. Muslims in Xinjiang face restrictions and penalties related to aspects of their appearance with religious connotations, such as headscarves on women or beards on men.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

While workers in China are afforded important protections under existing laws, violations of labor and employment regulations are widespread. Exploitative employment practices such as wage theft, excessive overtime, student labor, and unsafe working conditions are pervasive in many industries. Forced labor and human trafficking are common, affecting internal migrants as well as Chinese nationals who are trafficked abroad. Forced labor is the norm in prisons and other detention facilities.

Colombia

Population: 50,900,000
Capital: Bogotá
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Status Change: Colombia's status improved from Partly Free to Free due to more open and competitive national elections, a decline in restrictions on assembly and movement, and the decriminalization of abortion. However, illegal armed groups remained active, and the country was still one of the deadliest in the world for human rights defenders.

Overview: Colombia is among the longest-standing democracies in Latin America, but one with a history of widespread violence and serious human rights abuses. Public institutions have demonstrated the capacity to check executive power, and the country's main left-wing guerrilla group signed a peace accord in 2016. Nonetheless, Colombia faces enormous challenges in consolidating peace and guaranteeing political rights and civil liberties outside of major urban areas. In June 2022, opposition candidate and former left-wing guerrilla member Gustavo Petro was elected to the presidency and formed a government comprised of a broad left-wing coalition, becoming Colombia's first leftist government since the reestablishment of competitive democracy.

- Opposition politician Gustavo Petro, a former guerrilla member belonging to the now-defunct April 19th Movement (M-19), was elected president in a June runoff vote with 50.4 percent of the vote. Petro, Colombia's first leftist president, selected Francia Márquez, an environmentalist and civil society leader as vice president; Márquez is the first Afro-Colombian and the second woman to hold the post.
- Following March legislative elections, a broad coalition composed of both leftist and traditional parties gained a wide majority in Congress, and subsequently elected to support Petro's legislative agenda. The coalition included many of the parties that previously supported outgoing president Iván Duque.
- After taking office in August, Petro was able to broker a fragile, temporary truce between the government and various criminal organizations, such as the left-wing Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) rebel group. In December, the government announced a six-month cease-fire with the National Liberation Army (ELN), FARC dissidents, and three other armed groups. The ELN later denied adopting such an agreement.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 31 / 40 (+2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected to a four-year term. As part of a series of 2015 constitutional amendments, presidential reelection was eliminated.

No candidate garnered an outright majority in the first round of the 2022 election, held in May. Following a polarized runoff campaign, Gustavo Petro, the left-wing Historic Pact (PH) candidate, took 50.4 percent of the second-round vote in June, becoming Colombia's first leftist president, and defeating the former mayor of Bucaramanga, Rodolfo Hernández, who was backed by several leaders in incumbent president Iván Duque's party, the Democratic Center (CD). Voter turnout reached 58 percent, marking the highest turnout for presidential elections in nearly 25 years. The balloting was considered competitive and credible, and the results were accepted by stakeholders. Election observers logged sporadic reports of vote buying and other violations in both rounds of polls.

Congress is composed of the Senate and the Chamber of Representatives, with all seats up for election every four years. The nation at large selects 100 Senate members using a proportional representation system; two additional members are chosen by Indigenous communities, one seat is awarded to the runner-up in the presidential election, and another five seats were reserved in 2018 and 2022 for the FARC under the peace accord. Following the 2022 elections, the Chamber of Representatives features 188 members: 162 were elected by proportional representation in multimember districts, two chosen by Afro-Colombian communities, one each by Indigenous and expatriate voters, one seat reserved for the runner-up vice presidential candidate, five seats reserved for the FARC, and 16 seats reserved for representatives of victims of the country's internal conflict; the latter were instituted following an August 2021 law implementing a peace accord provision.

The March 2022 legislative elections were peaceful, though observers reported some irregularities and officials from multiple parties accused the electoral authorities of fraud, vote buying, and allowing candidacies for people with connections to organized crime figures. Most allegations came because of disparities between the unofficial preliminary vote count and the official tally released after the election. Ultimately, the final tally corrected earlier discrepancies, and independent observers deemed the polls and results credible.

Senate seats were dispersed, with seven parties winning 10 or more seats. Petro's PH won a plurality, taking 20 seats, followed by the Conservative Party with 15 seats, and the Liberal Party with 14. In the Chamber of Representatives, three parties won 21 or more seats, led by the Liberal Party with 32 seats. In its second balloting as a legal party, the FARC took no seats aside from the five guaranteed to it in each chamber.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The legal framework generally allows for competitive balloting in practice, though the nine-member National Electoral Council (CNE)—which oversees the conduct of the country's elections, including the financing of political campaigns and the counting of votes—has faced criticism for ineffective enforcement of electoral laws, blamed in part on the partisan selection system for its members. Congress voted in October 2021 to suspend a law that constrains public contracting during electoral periods, raising concerns about the diversion of state resources for electoral purposes; the Constitutional Court ruled against the law's suspension in February 2022, and cancelled all contracts signed while the suspension was in effect.

An internal audit of the National Registry, Colombia's election management body, found irregularities in ballot reporting during the 2022 legislative elections, but did not find evidence that fraud had occurred.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16 (+2)

Colombia's historically rigid two-party system has begun to diversify in recent years. It continued to do so in 2022, with candidates representing a wide range of parties—including new groups that emerged without obstruction—freely competing in the year's presidential and legislative elections. Opposition leader Gustavo Petro of the new PH party won the presidency in 2022 and garnered the support of a broad coalition of leftist politicians and civil society leaders, as well as seasoned politicians who broke from their traditional parties.

Three former political parties that had become defunct due to conflict-related violence returned to contest the 2022 elections after being reinstated by a December 2021 court ruling; similar redress is available for other political parties unduly impacted by the conflict.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because presidential candidates outside the country's two-party system—including the winning candidate—launched significant and credible campaigns during the May and June elections.

Democratic transfers of power between rival parties are routine at both the national level and in many regions, though significant areas remain under the long-term control of machine-style political clans with ties to organized crime. Following the 2022 presidential elections, opposition leader Gustavo Petro became Colombia's first leftist president and his PH party left the congressional opposition to lead the new governing coalition. Numerous prominent politicians occupy the political space between the extremes of Petro and the CD.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because a large group of political parties competed in the year's elections, weakening the country's traditional political duopoly.

After decades of political violence and insecurity around elections, the 2018 and 2022 elections were peaceful and safe for most voters. In limited areas, however, and despite the peace accord with the FARC, activity by the smaller ELN leftist guerrilla group, the successors of previously disbanded right-wing paramilitary groups, so-called "dissident" FARC members, and criminal gangs has continued to impair the ability of citizens to participate freely in the political process.

Women enjoy equal political rights, and at least 30 percent of the candidates on party lists must be women. Following the March 2022 legislative elections, the share of congressional seats held by women increased to 29 percent. Following the 2022 presidential elections, Francia Márquez became the first Afro-Colombian vice president and the second woman to hold the post. Colombia's Congress has historically disregarded women's issues, but in 2021 legislators passed several laws intended to improve social and economic conditions for women, including on issues of family violence and employment opportunities.

Though LGBT+ people's rights are legally protected and there are LGBT+ representatives in government, LGBT+ individuals are marginalized in the political sphere.

Lighter-skinned Colombians occupy a disproportionate share of government posts. While progress remains slow, the government has undertaken a series of steps to incorporate Indigenous and Afro-Colombian voices into national political debates in recent years. The 2016 peace accord included provisions for improving consultation mechanisms for marginalized groups, but issues affecting Afro-Colombians and Indigenous groups are rarely priorities in national policymaking.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

Elected officials generally determine government policy without interference. However, the Colombian state has long struggled to establish a secure presence in all parts of its territory, meaning threats from guerrilla groups and criminal gangs can disrupt policymaking and implementation in certain regions and localities. The peace accords ended FARC control of significant territory, but since 2017 nonstate armed actors have filled the void in many regions, with FARC dissidents and paramilitary successors expanding the territory in which state authority is absent or mainly limited to coca-eradication efforts.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption occurs at multiple levels of public administration. Graft scandals have emerged in recent years within an array of federal agencies, but investigations do result in convictions, including against senior officials.

However, in 2022 more than 200 individuals were sentenced on corruption charges, including a group of corrupt public officials led by a former congressperson.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Government information is generally available to the public, though information related to military and security affairs, as well as criminal justice processes, can be difficult to access. Civil society groups and independent media have exposed irregularities in government spending and contracting in recent years, including identifying shortcomings in government data regarding disbursement and oversight of COVID-19-related emergency spending.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 39 / 60 (+4)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16 (+1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of expression, and opposition views are commonly aired in the media. However, journalists face intimidation and violence both while reporting and in retaliation for their work. The government has prosecuted several notorious cases of murdered journalists in recent years, but convictions are rare. Free expression groups including the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) also harshly criticized the government for a 2021 attempt to undermine the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR) October ruling that the state bore responsibility for the 2000 kidnapping, sexual assault, and torture of journalist Jineth Bedoya. As of September 2022, the crime remained under investigation by Colombian officials.

Self-censorship is common, and slander and defamation remain criminal offenses. The government does not restrict access to the internet, nor does it censor websites. Twitter and other social media platforms have become important arenas for political discourse, but large areas of Colombia remain without local news coverage. Government officials, including President Petro, have sometimes disparaged members of the media in response to negative coverage of the government and ruling coalition.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of religion, and the government generally respects this right in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4 (+1)

Academic freedom is generally respected, and university debates are often vigorous. Armed groups maintain a presence on some campuses to generate political support and intimidate opponents, and some of their threats impacted some academic activities in Medellin and Cordoba in 2022. However, the overall activity of armed groups on campuses has significantly decreased in recent years. Most academic activities proceeded without interruption in 2022, in contrast to the total suspension of the academic calendar seen in major public universities during the 2021 mass protests.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because armed groups are less active on campuses and because academics encounter fewer impediments when engaging in scholarly work.

Individual expression is generally protected in major urban centers, but it remains inhibited in more remote areas where the state, insurgents, and criminals vie for control.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12 (+1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4 (+1)

Although provided for in the constitution, freedom of assembly is restricted in practice by violence. A wave of protests, dubbed the national strike, swept the country between April and June 2021, inspired by a range of grievances, including a government-proposed tax plan, economic despair, and police brutality. Most protests were peaceful, but some individuals destroyed property and erected blockades that disrupted supplies of essential goods and services in several cities. Police cracked down on protesters with what domestic and international rights observers characterized as serious human rights abuses. Government prosecutors opened numerous investigations into their actions, but officials also repeatedly portrayed protesters as terrorists, blamed the unrest on armed infiltrators, and downplayed the scale of rights violations. In January 2022, then-president Duque signed into law Congress's controversial Citizen Security Law, which human rights advocates claimed could exacerbate unjust treatment of protesters.

Colombians organized various street protests in 2022, which generally proceeded peacefully.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because demonstrators encountered fewer violent responses from security forces than in the previous year.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The legal framework generally supports nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and civil society is diverse and active, but the threat of violent reprisal poses a major obstacle to freedom of association. While the government provides protection to thousands of threatened human rights workers, hundreds of activists have been murdered in recent years, mostly by insurgents or the criminal organizations that succeeded demobilized right-wing paramilitary groups. Impunity is widespread, with indictments and convictions occurring in only a small minority of cases.

Attacks on civil society leaders increased in 2022—189 were killed according to human rights group Indepaz—though newly elected President Petro committed to increasing protections for several civil society leaders. Land rights, victims' rights, and ethnic and Indigenous rights advocates are frequently targeted by illegal armed groups and other powerful interests seeking to control local illicit economies or halt the implementation of rural development plans, especially coca substitution programs.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers may form and join trade unions, bargain collectively, and strike, and antiunion discrimination is prohibited. Though Colombia's illegal armed groups have killed thousands of union activists and leaders over the past three decades, killings declined substantially from their peak in the early 2000s. Between April 2021 and March 2022, 13 trade unionists were murdered, down from 22 in the previous year, according to the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). A special prosecutorial unit has substantially increased prosecutions for such assassinations since 2007, but few investigations have targeted those who ordered the killings.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The justice system remains compromised by corruption and extortion. The Constitutional Court, the Council of State, and the Supreme Court have consistently exhibited independence from the executive, though corruption allegations involving members of the courts have damaged their credibility in recent years. In March 2021, a former Supreme Court chief justice was convicted of corruption and sentenced to 19 years in prison.

In February 2022, the Constitutional Court expanded abortion rights, decriminalizing all abortions performed up to the 24th week of pregnancy, despite fierce opposition from the government.

The Constitutional Court has repeatedly been asked to mediate polarizing political disputes, especially with respect to the Special Jurisdiction for Peace (JEP), a parallel judicial tribunal that lies at the heart of the 2016 peace accord's transitional justice system. Though critics of the peace accord, previously led by former president Álvaro Uribe, have repeatedly called for shutting down the JEP, it was able to fulfill its mandate without undue interference in 2022.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Colombia's prosecutorial service is relatively professional, but watchdog groups suggest that key oversight institutions, including the Attorney General's Office, became less independent during the Duque administration. Due process protections remain weak, and trial processes move very slowly, though a judicial reform passed in June 2021 included provisions intended to accelerate legal processes.

The country's two key transitional justice bodies following the peace accord, the JEP and the Truth Commission, began operations in 2018; by late 2021 they had amassed enormous volumes of evidence and received testimony from thousands of people. The Truth Commission delivered its final report in 2022, calling for "sweeping changes" to the country's military and for a renewed focus on human rights. The report was disseminated widely, despite fierce criticism from members of the CD. The JEP issued several indictments in 2022, including filing criminal charges against more than a dozen military officials accused of war crimes in July. However, uncertainty remains about the extent to which the bodies will be able to render a comprehensive historical and judicial accounting of Colombia's conflict.

Many soldiers operate with limited civilian oversight, though the government has in recent years increased human rights training and investigated violations by security forces personnel. Collaboration between security forces and illegal armed groups has declined, but rights groups report official toleration of paramilitary successor groups in some regions. The police lack necessary resources, some units are prone to abuse, and police are largely absent from many rural areas where the most dangerous groups are active. The rights abuses committed by police during the national strike in 2021 prompted calls for deep institutional changes. In response to these calls, President Petro installed new military and police commanders in August 2022; Petro has also promised to reform the controversial riot control forces and to remove the police from the Ministry of Defense, though these changes had not been implemented before year's end. Reforms to the national police disciplinary code were enacted in March, introducing new provisions that impose stricter penalties for police officers found to have used excessive force.

Civil-military relations have been a source of significant tension in recent years. A portion of the armed forces opposed the peace process, and the ability of accused human rights violators within the military to receive benefits under the transitional justice system is one of the most controversial elements of the process. Scandals involving both corruption and rights violations have continued to buffet the military, including the bombing of a FARC dissident camp in March 2021 that killed several minors.

Some parts of the country, particularly resource-rich zones and drug-trafficking corridors, remain highly insecure. Remnant guerrilla forces—including both the ELN and dissident factions of the FARC—and paramilitary successor groups regularly abuse the civilian population, especially in coca-growing areas. However, President Petro has spoken out against the "irrational" war on drugs, saying that the associated violence has been fueled by militaristic anti-drug policies. A general conflict fragmentation and intensification has affected some areas, illustrated by a continuing rise in the number of people affected by mass displacement—in December 2022, the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) reported that over 78,000 people were displaced during the year. After Petro took office in August, a number of criminal organizations expressed willingness to accept an offer of more lenient terms of surrender to the state, resulting in a fragile truce that temporarily improved safety for citizens in some areas.

A steady trickle of former FARC combatants, including several high-ranking members, have returned to clandestine life, alleging government failure to abide by the accord's terms. Indepaz estimated the total number of "dissidents" at around 5,200 in October 2021; several of the most prominent dissidents have been killed in internecine fighting in Venezuela during 2021–22. President Petro proposed a new peace deal with FARC dissidents in August 2022, sparking criticism from the top government negotiators of the 2016 peace agreements. The Petro administration also began negotiations with the ELN in December, marking the first new talks with the organization since 2019. That month, the government announced a six-month cease-fire with the ELN, FARC dissidents, and three other armed groups; the ELN later denied adopting such an agreement.

Violence overall has significantly subsided since the internal conflict peaked in the early 2000s, but analysts have noted a gradual trend upward since 2017. The homicide rate decreased slightly between 2021 and 2022, but remained relatively high, with more than 12,000 cases reported as of November 2022. Impunity for crime in general is rampant, and prison conditions remain harsh.

The legal framework provides protections against various forms of discrimination based on gender, race and ethnicity, sexual orientation and gender identity, and other categories, and the government takes some measures to enforce these protections. Nevertheless, several vulnerable groups suffer serious disadvantages in practice.

Afro-Colombians, who account for as much as 25 percent of the population, make up the largest segment of the more than 7 million people who have been displaced by violence. Areas with concentrated Afro-Colombian populations continue to suffer vastly disproportionate levels of abuse by guerrillas, security forces, and criminal groups. UN officials have reported that impunity is nearly absolute for killers of Afro-Colombian and Indigenous ex-combatants and social leaders.

Most of Colombia's Indigenous inhabitants, who make up more than 3 percent of the population, live on approximately 34 million hectares granted to them by the government, often in resource-rich, strategic regions that are highly contested by armed groups. Indigenous people have been targeted by all sides in the country's various conflicts. In 2022, Indigenous communities in the departments of Chocó, Cauca, Valle de Cauca, and Nariño suffered widespread violence and displacement perpetrated by former FARC members, paramilitary successors, and criminal groups.

Women face employment discrimination and sexual harassment in the workplace, as well as gender-based violence. In June 2022, the Constitutional Court ruled that businesses must take steps to prevent and punish workplace gender violence.

Though Colombian law prohibits LGBT+ discrimination, LGBT+ individuals often suffer societal discrimination and abuse, and there are high levels of impunity for crimes committed against them. According to Colombian NGO Caribe Afirmativo, 49 LGBT+ people were murdered between January and August 2022.

As many as 2.4 million Venezuelan migrants have entered Colombia in recent years, and the government has offered work permits, access to services, and other accommodations to those who register. International relief agencies praised a February 2021 government announcement that Venezuelan migrants would be granted long-term temporary protection status, though stigmatization, discrimination, and lack of access to services remain problems.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16 (+2)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4 (+1)

Freedom of movement improved substantially in tandem with the peace process, but it remains restricted by ongoing violence in certain regions, particularly for marginalized people. More than 35,000 individuals were displaced during the first six months of 2022, mostly due to threats from armed groups. Travel in some remote areas is further limited by illegal checkpoints operated by criminal and guerrilla groups.

Most COVID-19-related restrictions on movement ended in 2022, but incoming international travelers were still required to be vaccinated or provide a negative coronavirus test before entering the country.

As of July 2022, more than one million Venezuelan migrants have been granted Temporary Protection Status (ETPV), allowing them to work and move freely in Colombia for 10 years. Permit-holders are eligible for a range of state-run programs and services, including healthcare and education.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the Colombian government began providing temporary permits for Venezuelan refugees and other migrants seeking protective measures and because COVID-19-related movement restrictions were loosened.

Violence and instability in some areas threaten property rights and the ability to establish businesses. Guerrillas, paramilitary successor groups, and common criminals regularly extort payments from business owners. Corruption as well as undue pressure exerted on prosecutors and members of the judiciary can disrupt legitimate business activity.

Progress remains slow on the implementation of the landmark 2011 Victims and Land Law, which recognized the legitimacy of claims by victims of conflict-related abuses, including those committed by government forces. While affected citizens continue receiving compensation and modest progress has been made on land titling, the legal process for land restitution is heavily backlogged, and the resettlement of those who were displaced during the conflict moved slowly during the Duque administration, which demonstrated limited will to advance the process. In 2022, the newly elected Petro administration promised to accelerate the process, and in October, the government agreed to a series of land purchases, which will be distributed at a subsidized price to those displaced by the conflict.

Personal social freedoms, such as those related to marriage and divorce, are largely respected. In 2016, after several years of contradictory judicial and administrative decisions regarding same-sex unions, the Constitutional Court voted to legalize them.

In February 2022, the Constitutional Court decriminalized all abortions performed within the first 24 weeks of pregnancy. Prior to this, women continued to face criminal charges for abortion.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because the Constitutional Court decriminalized abortions performed within the first 24 weeks of a pregnancy in a February ruling.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Child labor, the recruitment of children by illegal armed groups, and related sexual abuse are serious problems in Colombia; recruitment declined following the peace accord but has increased since 2020 amid pandemic-related disruption and violence. A 2011 free trade agreement with the United States and a subsequent Labor Action Plan called for enhanced investigation of abusive labor practices and rights violations, but progress remains deficient in several areas. In coca-growing zones, armed groups exert coercive pressure on farmers to engage in coca cultivation and shun government-run crop-substitution programs.

Comoros

Population: 800,000
Capital: Moroni
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Comoros's volatile political history includes coups and attempted coups, though some recent presidential and legislative elections were reasonably well administered. A controversial 2018 referendum introduced major systemic changes, and opponents of the referendum were severely persecuted. Since winning the referendum and securing reelection in 2019, President Azali Assoumani has consolidated power by cracking down on the opposition and limiting press freedom. Systemic corruption and poverty remain problems.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In February, the government launched a national dialogue intended to build consensus on political and socioeconomic topics. The Inter-Comorian National Dialogue, which concluded in March, was boycotted by a great majority of the opposition, who did not believe that it would provide an opportunity for genuine political engagement.
- In March, the former governor of Anjouan, Abdou Salami Abdou—who had been in pretrial detention since his October 2018 arrest—was tried and sentenced to 12 years in prison for allegedly participating in an insurrection, disturbing public order, and undermining national unity. Observers have called the former governor a political prisoner.
- Former president Ahmed Abdallah Sambi, who was arrested for corruption-related crimes in 2018, was brought to trial in November; Sambi refused to attend the trial after the first day, calling the proceedings "illegitimate." Though Sambi was initially charged with corruption, at his trial, he was sentenced to life in prison for the crime of "high treason."

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 16 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 5 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Under the 2001 constitution, the president was directly elected for a single five-year term, with eligibility rotating among the main islands of Grande Comore (Ngazidja), Anjouan, and Mohéli. However, a new constitution, approved in a controversial 2018 referendum that was boycotted by the opposition, allows the president to run for two consecutive five-year terms, and abolished the system of rotating power among the islands. The referendum allowed President Azali Assoumani of the Convention for the Renewal of the Comoros (CRC) party to contest and win the March 2019 presidential election, which was also boycotted by the opposition. Azali was sworn in for a second presidential term in May 2021.

The Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI) and the Supreme Court agreed that Azali won the election in the first round. Twelve opposition candidates rejected the results. Observers, including from the African Union (AU), said the contest was marred by irregularities.

The unicameral Assembly of the Union consists of 24 directly elected members who serve five-year terms. Another 9 members were previously selected by the three islands' assemblies, but those seats were eliminated via a 2019 ordinance.

The 2020 legislative elections, held in two rounds in January and February, were boycotted by the major opposition parties. Progovernment candidates won every seat; the CRC won 20, the allied Orange Party won 2, and progovernment independent candidates won the remaining 2. AU monitors who observed the January round called the contest generally peaceful, but noted a lack of public interest due to the opposition boycott.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The CENI, while historically able to run credible elections, has faced more recent accusations of bias and corruption.

The 2018 constitutional referendum was marred by an opposition boycott. Opposition groups denounced it as an unconstitutional power grab by Azali, and said Azali's dismissal of the Constitutional Court ahead of the vote rendered it illegal. There were also allegations of voter intimidation and fraud.

Among other things, the new constitution allows the president to run for two consecutive terms, abolished the system of rotating power among the islands, and abolished the three vice-presidential posts (one representing each island). The new constitution also transferred the competencies of the Constitutional Court, which was considered impartial in deciding electoral matters, to a new Supreme Court chamber.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

Political parties are mainly formed around specific leaders and draw on island or ethnic bases of support. In the past, parties generally operated freely, though the government occasionally disrupted opposition parties' activities by denying them meeting and assembly space.

The authorities systematically cracked down on opposition figures who publicly criticized the 2018 constitutional referendum. The former governor of Anjouan, Abdou Salami Abdou, who had been in pretrial detention since his October 2018 arrest, was tried and sentenced to 12 years in prison in March 2022 for allegedly participating in an insurrection, disturbing public order, and undermining national unity. Observers have called the former governor a political prisoner.

Presidential candidates Achmet Said Mohamed and Soilihi Mohamed were briefly detained in March 2019, though both were later released. Soilihi, who led a National Transitional Council (CNT) that unsuccessfully attempted to force Azali from office through civil disobedience and industrial action, agreed to refrain from further involvement after his release that April.

In February 2022, the government launched a national dialogue intended to build consensus on political and socioeconomic issues. The Inter-Comorian National Dialogue, which concluded in March, reportedly submitted a number of recommendations to the government, including on political reforms. The dialogue was boycotted by a majority of the opposition, some of whom likened participation in the dialogue to offering President Azali a "blank check" to pursue his own political agenda.

In the past, numerous opposition parties had a realistic chance of gaining power through elections, though they were impeded by occasional government interference. Allegations of misuse of state resources by incumbents were not uncommon. However, the arrests, convictions, and harsh sentences against opposition leaders who spoke out against the 2018 constitutional referendum hampered the ability of opposition parties to compete in elections. The 2020 legislative elections, which were marred by an opposition boycott, ended with progovernment candidates winning every seat.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

While individuals are generally free to exercise their political choices, the influence of Comoros's powerful army—which cracked down on dissent during the 2018 constitutional referendum—as well as of religious authorities can place pressure on voters and candidates.

The army was used to intimidate and detain opposition figures during and after the 2019 presidential campaign. Gendarmes arrested Soilihi after he announced his CNT involvement that March. Gendarmes also interrogated the spouse of presidential candidate Achmet, who served as a CNT spokesperson, that April.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

There are no laws preventing various segments of the population from enjoying full political rights and electoral opportunities. However, traditional attitudes discourage women from participating in politics. Only four women won legislative seats in the 2020 polls. Legal and societal discrimination against LGBT+ people makes political advocacy for LGBT+ rights difficult.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

According to the constitution, the president decides on the policies of the state, which are executed by the government. However, irregular legislative activity hampered representative policymaking in previous years.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

There are reports of corruption at all levels, including within the judiciary, civil service, and security forces. The Azali administration dissolved the National Commission for Preventing and Fighting Corruption in 2016.

In 2018, former president Ahmed Abdallah Sambi was arrested for corruption, embezzlement, and forgery in connection with a passport-sales scheme. A parliamentary report that year revealed that the scheme cost Comoros as much as $971 million. Sambi was convicted of "high treason" for his role in the scheme and sentenced to life in prison in a November 2022 trial.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations are characterized by opacity. Various reform initiatives have been unsuccessful. Financial asset disclosures by public officials are not released to the public. Comoros provides no opportunities for public engagement in the budget process.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 26 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The constitution and laws provide for freedom of speech and of the press. However, the use of censorship laws to prosecute legitimate journalistic work, and other pressure, has prompted widespread self-censorship. Press freedom was restricted in 2018 with the closings of private radio stations as criticism of Azali and the constitutional referendum gained traction.

Journalistic activity remained restricted throughout 2022, and journalists continue to face harassment and intimidation, including from government officials. Arrests of journalists and bloggers are common.

Some 98 percent of the population is Sunni Muslim. Sunni Islam was made the state religion in 2018, resulting in wariness of the government among adherents of minority religions. Previously, the state religion had been "Islam"; some observers suggested the change reflected Azali's efforts to bring Comoros closer to Saudi Arabia and to counter the influence of former president Sambi, who is seen as close to Iran.

Anti-Shia sentiments have been publicly expressed by some government figures, while many Christians keep their faith private to avoid harassment. Proselytizing and public religious ceremonies are prohibited for all religions except Sunni Islam.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Comoros has two types of schools: madrassas, where the Quran is integral, and state-run schools with French instruction. Academic freedom is generally respected, though the education system is sometimes affected by unrest from student protests and teacher strikes. Self-censorship on political topics is reportedly common within the education system.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Private discussion is generally free. However, the legacies of the country's volatile political history—which involves coups and attempted coups, the opposition crackdown during the 2018 constitutional referendum, authorities' monitoring of social media during the 2019 presidential campaign, and a one-day shutdown of telecommunications services that March—can discourage people from openly discussing politics in some situations.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedoms of assembly and association are constitutionally protected, but these freedoms have been inconsistently upheld, and have deteriorated significantly since 2018. Opposition rallies held before and soon after the March 2019 presidential election were violently dispersed. Public gatherings were banned under COVID-19-related measures in 2020; such measures remained in effect during much of 2021 and 2022.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) sometimes face bureaucratic interference, including requirements to secure permits from high-level officials to visit prisons. Some NGO representatives have spoken out against the atmosphere of repression in recent years, but did so at some risk in light of the broad crackdown on dissent.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers have the right to form unions, bargain collectively, and strike. In cases of national interest, the government may require essential personnel to return to work. No law prohibits antiunion discrimination or protects workers from retribution for striking. There are some laws that impose mandatory arbitration processes for labor disputes.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judicial system is based on both Sharia (Islamic law) and the French legal code. Though the law establishes mechanisms for the selection of judges and attorneys, the executive often disregards these and simply appoints people to their positions. Court decisions are not always upheld.

The 2018 referendum abolished the Constitutional Court and established a new constitutional chamber of the Supreme Court. This chamber ruled in favor of the government during the March 2019 election period by barring several candidates from running and by validating the results, despite widespread concerns over voting irregularities.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

All defendants have the right to a fair public trial, but they often face lengthy delays. Due-process rights are affected by corruption.

Political figures, including candidates, have been denied due process. Former president Sambi's legal pretrial detention period ended in April 2019, but he remained under house arrest until his trial in November 2022. Sambi refused to attend the trial after the first day, calling the proceedings "illegitimate"; some observers have called Sambi a political prisoner. Though Sambi was initially charged with corruption, at his trial, he was sentenced to life in prison for the crime of "high treason"—a crime his lawyers claim does not exist in Comorian law.

In May 2020, Inssa "Bobocha" Mohamed was arrested for allegedly attacking President Azali in an unsuccessful bombing the previous month. Bobocha remained in pretrial detention until escaping from prison that November; he was returned to custody in January 2021. He was allegedly held as a "secret prisoner" before his March 2022 trial, after which he was sentenced to eight years in prison for "criminal association and conspiracy."

The law prohibits the illegitimate use of physical force, but security agents have engaged in excessive force, and are generally not held accountable for such behavior. There are questions about the will or capacity of the army to identify and punish abuses within its ranks.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

The law provides for equality of persons. However, same-sex sexual activity is illegal, with punishments of a fine and up to five years' imprisonment. Few women hold positions of responsibility in business outside of elite families. Laws requiring that services be provided for people with disabilities are not well enforced.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Internal and external freedom of movement is constitutionally and legally protected. While these rights are generally respected in practice, poverty frequently prevents travel between the islands as well as access to higher education.

The authorities introduced COVID-19-related movement restrictions in March 2020, suspending travel to the French territories of Mayotte and Réunion. An overnight curfew was imposed in February 2021 and remained in effect until June 2022.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

In accordance with civil and some customary laws, women have equal rights in inheritance matters. Local cultures on Grande Comore and Mohéli are matrilineal, with women legally possessing all inheritable property. However, this is complicated by the concurrent application of Sharia, interpretations of which can limit gender equality. In addition, a poor land-registration system and women's difficulties in securing loans hampers their right to own land.

Endemic corruption and a lack of transparency hampers normal business activity.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Early and forced marriages have been reported in Comoros. The law prohibits domestic violence, but courts rarely fine or order the imprisonment of convicted perpetrators, and women and children rarely file official complaints. Sexual violence and workplace harassment are believed to be widespread, but are rarely reported to authorities.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

The Comorian economy, which is primarily agricultural, relies heavily on remittances from Comorian citizens in France. Many young people struggle to find sustainable opportunities for employment. Poverty has driven many people to attempt the dangerous trip to Mayotte.

Government efforts to identify and prosecute human trafficking are minimal, and trafficking cases, if addressed, are often done so through informal mediation processes. These mechanisms have sometimes facilitated the return of trafficking victims to traffickers. However, in August 2021, Comoros ratified the International Labour Organization's (ILO) Forced Labour Protocol, which is designed to "eliminate forced labor," and requires the government to take legal action against traffickers.

Congo, Republic of the (Brazzaville)

Population: 6,000,000
Capital: Brazzaville
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: President Denis Sassou Nguesso has maintained nearly uninterrupted power for over 40 years by severely repressing the opposition. Corruption and decades of political instability have contributed to poor economic performance and high levels of poverty. Abuses by security forces are frequently reported and rarely investigated. While a variety of media operate, independent coverage is limited by widespread self-censorship and the influence of owners. Human rights– and governance-related nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) scrutinize state abuses, but also self-censor to avoid reprisals. Religious figures are also known to self-censor.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In February, curfews affecting the cities of Brazzaville and Pointe-Noire—and originally imposed under the pretext of the COVID-19 pandemic—were lifted, as were national border controls.
- In the July parliamentary elections, the ruling Congolese Labor Party (PCT) took 112 lower-house seats while the opposition Pan-African Union for Social Democracy (UPADS) and Union of Humanist Democrats–YUKI (UDH-YUKI) each won 7. The elections were marred by opposition boycotts, credible allegations that the vote would be rigged, opposition accusations of fraud, and low turnout.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is directly elected to five-year terms. The 2002 constitution restricted the president to two terms and set an age limit of 70. However, a 2015 constitutional referendum proposed by President Denis Sassou Nguesso removed those restrictions, allowing him to run again. The referendum passed amid widespread protests and claims of fraud.

Sassou Nguesso has held power since 1979, with the exception of a five-year period in the 1990s. In March 2021, he secured a fourth presidential term since returning to power in 1997, claiming 88.4 percent of the vote. The election was marked by a boycott from the UPADS, intimidation, and an internet shutdown. Authorities also restricted assembly rights ahead of polling day. Guy Brice Parfait Kolélas, who died of COVID-19 soon after the election, won 8 percent.

Congo's parliament consists of a 72-seat Senate and a 151-seat National Assembly. Councilors from every department elect senators to six-year terms. National Assembly members are directly elected to five-year terms.

The two-round July 2022 legislative elections were boycotted by several opposition parties amid credible allegations that the vote would be rigged. Sassou Nguesso's PCT claimed 112 National Assembly seats when the polls were fully concluded, while its allies won 12 in the first round. The opposition UPADS and UDH-YUKI each won 7. Opposition groups alleged that the elections were fraudulent; voter turnout was low.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The 2015 constitutional referendum to increase presidential term limits consolidated the PCT's dominance of the political system by allowing Sassou Nguesso to run for a third term. Elections are administered by the Independent National Electoral Commission, which was established in 2016 and is widely regarded as an instrument of presidential authority.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

Political groupings exist, but the government represses those not aligned with the PCT, including by persecuting their leaders. In 2016, opposition leader Paulin Makaya of the United for Congo (UPC) party was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for inciting disorder over his participation in protests against the constitutional referendum. Makaya was released in 2018 but was blocked from leaving the country on several occasions; Makaya was allowed to seek medical treatment abroad in 2021.

Sassou Nguesso's two most prominent opponents in the 2016 presidential election received prison terms after that contest. In 2018, retired general Jean-Marie Michel Mokoko was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment for threatening state security. In 2019, André Okombi Salissa, who had led the opposition Initiative for Democracy in Congo coalition, was sentenced to 20 years of forced labor for the same charge.

Private campaign contributions are banned, leaving opposition parties and candidates dependent on limited public financing.

Political parties are sometimes denied registration without cause. In 2020, the government suspended a number of parties, including the UPC, excluding them from its list of approved parties.

There is little opportunity for the opposition to gain power through elections, and opposition leaders frequently experience harassment, intimidation, and arrest. During the 2016 presidential race, opposition candidates Mokoko and Okombi Salissa were repeatedly harassed and were subsequently imprisoned. In 2021, Kolélas complained of movement restrictions, while authorities cancelled some campaign events.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The Sassou Nguesso government routinely uses military and police forces to intimidate citizens. Employers engage in widespread discrimination in hiring and regarding other decisions, based on political beliefs.

Although there are no legal restrictions on political participation by religion, gender, sexual identity, or ethnic group, members of Sassou Nguesso's northern Mbochi ethnic group occupy key government posts. Insofar as the government includes representatives from other regional and ethnic groups, their ability to shape policy is very limited. The government routinely suppresses political parties that draw support from Congo's southern regions, which have long opposed Sassou Nguesso.

Women, whose political participation is limited by societal constraints, are underrepresented in government. Women won only 25 National Assembly seats in the July 2022 elections and held only 13 Senate seats as of year's end. Evelyne Tchitchelle of the PCT became the country's first female mayor when she was elected in Pointe-Noire in September 2022. Tchitchelle had not been sworn in by year's end.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Government policy is set by President Sassou Nguesso, who won reelection in a deeply flawed process in March 2021. There is little oversight from the parliament, which is dominated by the ruling PCT and protects the executive from accountability.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is endemic, and domestic prosecutions for corruption are often politically motivated. The president's family and advisers control the state-run National Petroleum Company of Congo (SNPC) without meaningful oversight, and offshore companies are allegedly used to embezzle SNPC funds.

Sassou Nguesso's family has long been dogged by credible allegations of corruption. In June 2022, French investigators seized a Paris property belonging to Denis Christel Sassou Nguesso, the president's son, though prosecutors said in September that no indictment had been lodged against him. In August, French outlet Mediapart reported that authorities there suspected him of laundering €19 million ($19.9 million).

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government operations are opaque. Although the constitution guarantees access to information, there is no implementing legislation, nor is there a specific law mandating public access to official information. Public procurement procedures are nontransparent. Authorities generally do not publish draft legislation or regulations.

In 2020, Global Witness reported that the SNPC held as much as $3.3 billion in undisclosed liabilities, some of which resulted from activities unrelated to oil production, while dividends owed to the government had gone missing.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 15 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

While the constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, the government routinely pressures, threatens, and incarcerates journalists. While there are numerous media outlets, many are owned by government allies who influence their coverage. Widespread self-censorship among journalists discourages independent reporting in practice.

Augias Ray Malonga, interim editor of the Sel-Piment newspaper, was arrested in Brazzaville in late December 2021 and was released in January 2022. Later in January, Congo's media regulator suspended the publication of Sel-Piment for six months after it republished an article alleging corruption on the part of the country's treasurer; the article was originally published by an exile-run website. In December, the regulator suspended VOX TV, accusing the private broadcaster of disseminating information that could "disturb public order."

Although religious freedom is generally respected, pastors are reticent to make statements that could be construed as hostile to the government. In 2015, the government banned the wearing of the niqab, the full face veil, in public, citing security and terrorism concerns.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is tenuous. Most university professors avoid discussions of or research on politically sensitive topics. In 2018, the government announced that it would ban a book, published in Paris, about widespread human rights abuses perpetrated by the military in the Pool Region between 2016 and 2017.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

The government surveils electronic communications of private individuals and maintains an extensive surveillance apparatus, which includes secret police and local informants. Surveillance is reportedly prevalent in public spaces in Brazzaville and Pointe-Noire. Citizens who speak out against the government are often arrested.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The government restricts freedom of assembly. Groups must receive official authorization from local and federal authorities to hold public assemblies, and permission is routinely denied. Government forces sometimes employ violence against protesters or disperse assemblies.

The government imposed curfews and assembly restrictions under the pretext of limiting the spread of COVID-19 in previous years. While curfews affecting Brazzaville and Pointe-Noire were lifted in February 2022, citizens remained concerned about the threat of repression; no prominent antigovernment protests were reported during the year.

Although the constitution guarantees freedom of association, NGOs must register with the Interior Ministry. Those critical of the government often encounter a more burdensome registration process. Arbitrary arrests of civil society figures have continued in recent years, contributing to a reduction in activity. Groups still operating commonly curtail reporting on human rights abuses or word criticism of authorities carefully to avoid reprisals or harassment.

In September 2022, security forces reportedly ransacked the offices of the Congolese Observatory of Human Rights (OCDH), which has published reports critical of the government, and another human rights NGO.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Although union rights are nominally protected, laws protecting union members are not always enforced. The government has intervened in labor disputes by harassing and arresting laborers and pressuring union leaders, particularly against the country's largest labor union, the Congolese Trade Union Confederation.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Congo's judiciary is dominated by Sassou Nguesso's allies, crippled by lack of resources, and vulnerable to corruption and political influence. In 2015, the Constitutional Court's confirmation of the constitutional referendum results was viewed as a rubber-stamp approval of Sassou Nguesso's efforts to remain in power. In 2021, the Constitutional Court rejected legitimate objections to the conduct of that March's elections.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Defendants, including the government's political opponents, are routinely denied due process. Arbitrary arrests and detentions are constitutionally prohibited but are nevertheless common. Other fair-trial rights guaranteed by law, including the right to legal assistance for those who cannot afford it, are not always honored in practice.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Citizens in some neighborhoods are at risk of intimidation and violent crime by groups of young men known as bébés noirs. There have also been reports of arbitrary arrests and physical abuses by police attempting to curb the activities of such groups. Reports of human rights violations by security forces are generally not investigated by the government.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Employment discrimination against women persists. The government prevents refugees and other foreign workers from holding certain jobs, and refugees sometimes face harassment and arrest by authorities.

While no law specifically prohibits same-sex sexual relations between adults, LGBT+ people experience occasional police harassment.

Minority ethnic groups experience severe discrimination in employment, housing, and education. Some communities often live in substandard housing on the outskirts of villages, and occasionally are targeted in acts of violence committed by members of the majority Bantu population.

The government exhibits widespread discrimination against residents of Congo's southern regions. They are routinely denied high-paying public-sector jobs, as well as admission to the public university. By contrast, residents of Congo's northern regions are disproportionately appointed to key government positions and the civil service.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

Although private citizens generally enjoy freedom of movement, activists and opposition leaders can face restrictions and confiscation of their passports.

The government imposed curfews, border closures, and internal travel restrictions in response to the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020. While curfews expired in much of Congo that year, nighttime curfews in Brazzaville and Pointe-Noire remained in effect until February 2022, when borders were also reopened.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Legal protections for business and property rights can be undermined by bureaucracy, poor judicial safeguards, and corruption. The government directly or indirectly controls property in key industries such as oil, minerals, and aviation.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Violence against women, including domestic violence and rape, is widespread but rarely reported. There are no specific laws forbidding domestic violence other than general assault statutes.

Men are legally considered the head of the household, and divorce settlements are thus skewed against women. Adultery is illegal for both men and women, but women convicted of the crime face a potential prison sentence, while the penalty for men is a fine.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Congo is a source and destination country for human trafficking, and allegations of complicity have been lodged against government officials. However, the US State Department reported in its 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report that authorities made some efforts to increase antitrafficking efforts by finalizing an updated action plan, providing more assistance to victims, and opening investigations of trafficking cases.

According to local NGOs, members of minority groups have been conscripted into forced farm labor by members of the Bantu ethnic majority. Child labor laws are reportedly not effectively enforced.

Congo, Democratic Republic of the (Kinshasa)

Population: 99,000,000
Capital: Kinshasa
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The political system in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) is paralyzed due the manipulation of the electoral process by political elites. Citizens are unable to freely exercise basic civil liberties, and corruption is endemic. Physical security is tenuous due to violence and human rights abuses committed by government forces, as well as armed rebel groups and militias in many areas of the country.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- The armed March 23 Movement (M23) maintained an offensive against government forces in the east of the country throughout the year. East African Community (EAC) member states agreed to send an armed mission to support the government in April. Rwanda, which is believed to back M23, negotiated a truce between the group and Kinshasa in November, but M23 fighters did not immediately lay down their arms.
- Violent protests against the continued presence of UN peacekeepers occurred in July. Protesters damaged UN offices in several eastern cities, while peacekeepers reportedly used excessive force. Some 36 people were killed nationwide in the clashes.
- In December, the UN Security Council voted to extend the organization's peacekeeping mission in the DRC through the end of 2023; under a previous plan, the mission would have continued through 2024.
- In August, opposition leader Jean-Marc Kabund, who was formerly an ally of President Félix Tshisekedi, was arrested for allegedly insulting the president. Kabund had launched a new opposition party in July.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 4 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

According to the constitution, the president is chief of state and is elected for a maximum of two five-year terms. The prime minister is head of government and is formally appointed by the president.

Félix Tshisekedi was declared president in 2019, following elections held in late 2018. His predecessor, Joseph Kabila, had overstayed his constitutional mandate by two years; the Constitutional Court allowed Kabila to stay in office until his successor's election, but polls were repeatedly delayed. The Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI) declared Tshisekedi president with 38.6 percent of the vote, defeating Martin Fayulu of the Lamuka (Wake Up) coalition, who reportedly secured 34.8 percent. Tshisekedi, of the Course for Change (CACH) coalition, was believed to have come to power via a backroom deal under which he allied with the Kabila-led Common Front for Congo (FCC). The poll was heavily criticized due to voter suppression and electoral fraud; several opposition candidates were barred from running.

By the end of 2020, Tshisekedi and the CACH ended their coalition with the FCC. Sylvestre Ilunga Ilukamba, a Kaliba ally, resigned as prime minister in January 2021 after losing a no-confidence vote. Tshisekedi appointed Jean-Michel Sama Lukonde Kyenge as prime minister that February.

The DRC has a bicameral national legislature with a 500-seat National Assembly chosen via direct election, and a 109-seat Senate elected by provincial assemblies. Eight Senate seats are reserved for customary chiefs. As former president, Kabila holds a lifetime Senate appointment. Members of both houses serve five-year terms. The FCC won 341 National Assembly seats, the Lamuka coalition took 102, and the CACH took 46 in the deeply flawed 2018 parliamentary elections.

In late 2020, President Tshisekedi announced a new coalition, the Sacred Union of the Nation (USN); he went on to sway many pro-Kaliba lawmakers to back it. By April 2021, when Tshisekedi announced a new cabinet, he and the USN reportedly had the support of 400 lower-house members.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The country's electoral framework does not ensure transparent elections in practice. Opposition parties and civil society frequently criticize CENI and the Constitutional Court for lacking independence. CENI has also been affected by corruption. In 2019, the US Treasury Department sanctioned three CENI officials, accusing them of undermining the electoral process.

In November 2022, CENI announced that the next presidential election would be held in December 2023 but warned that its work would be affected by the ongoing coronavirus pandemic, Ebola, and armed conflict.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

People have the right to organize political parties. Hundreds of parties exist, with many configured along ethnic or regional lines; 34 parties won National Assembly seats in the 2018 elections. Most parties lack national reach and their ability to function is limited in practice. Opposition leaders and supporters are often intimidated and face restrictions on movement and rights to campaign or organize public events. Coalitions have also shifted in recent years, with the USN being formed in 2020 and displacing a pro-Kabila majority in the legislature by 2021.

Under the Tshisekedi administration, some opposition members have been released from prison and some politicians living in exile were permitted to return. However, political-party officials still faced reprisals for criticizing the government. In August 2022, opposition leader and erstwhile Tshisekedi ally Jean-Marc Kabund was arrested for allegedly insulting the president; Kabund launched a new party, the Alliance for Change, the month before.

Opposition groups enjoy significant public support, but their electoral prospects have been impacted by the repeated postponement of elections, government interference in polling, and disruptions of opposition candidates' activities. Armed groups have also obstructed candidate movements.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Citizens' political choices and their ability to participate in the political process are hindered by the military, security services, and armed groups.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Lack of access to public services and state institutions in rural areas hinder political participation. Women are politically underrepresented, holding only 12.8 percent of National Assembly seats. Ethnic-minority and Indigenous groups are effectively missing in the political sphere.

Although homosexuality is not explicitly criminalized, LGBT+ people are marginalized; civil society groups that explicitly mention LGBT+ issues in their constitutions have been denied official registration.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Massive electoral fraud and irregularities prevent democratically elected officials from determining government policies. A "state of siege" in North Kivu and Ituri provinces was imposed in 2021 as part of the government's efforts to reestablish control over violence-affected areas. The state of siege was most recently renewed in December 2022.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption in the government, security forces, and mineral extraction industries is extensive and has corroded public services and development efforts.

President Tshisekedi publicly committed the government to fighting corruption when he came to power. In 2020, Tshisekedi's chief of staff, Vital Kamerhe, was convicted and received a 20-year forced-labor sentence for embezzling public funds. However, Kamerhe and a codefendant were cleared of embezzlement charges in June 2022.

In 2021, reports revealed Israeli businessman Dan Gertler's embezzlement of $3.7 billion in state funds through Kabila-approved contracts over several years. In February 2022, the government and Gertler signed an agreement where a Gertler-linked company would return assets that were reportedly worth over $2 billion. Civil society groups criticized the government for its lack of transparency over the deal, which was believed to favor Gertler.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Despite previous incremental improvements in revenue reporting, there is little transparency in the state's financial affairs. The law does not provide for public access to government information, and citizens often lack the practical ability to obtain records on public expenditures and state operations. Contracts for the extractive industries are conducted in secret.

In 2021, some efforts were made to bring the Central Bank of Congo (BCC) into compliance with International Monetary Fund (IMF) protocols as a condition for loans. However, required financial disclosures from top officials were not made public; tax agencies suffer from poor reporting; and shadow networks determine political and financial decisions in practice. In a September 2022 technical update, the IMF reported that a bill on the BCC's transparency and independence existed in draft form and expected its ultimate approval. The IMF authorized a disbursement of funds in December.

The government is not transparent on the state's involvement in violence in insecure areas. Military authorities, who are inaccessible to constituents, were installed in Ituri and North Kivu when a state of siege was imposed on those provinces in 2021.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 15 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Although media freedom is constitutionally guaranteed, journalists often face criminal defamation suits, threats, detentions, arbitrary arrests, and physical attacks in the course of their work. The DRC has a diverse media environment, but only UN-affiliated Radio Okapi and the state-owned Congolese National Radio Television are accessible nationwide; print outlets' reach is largely limited to the capital.

Civil society groups have reported a rising trend of repression under the Tshisekedi administration. In November 2022, Journalist in Danger (JED), a Congolese watchdog, reported 124 press freedom violations over the year to date, a 13 percent increase over reported abuses in 2021. According to JED, one journalist was killed in 2022.

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, and authorities generally respect this right in practice. Although religious groups must register with the government to be recognized, unregistered groups typically operate unhindered. Some religious facilities, personnel, and services have been affected by violence in conflict areas.

Mosques in North Kivu operate in a threatening environment. Islamist rebels have targeted Muslims who criticize Islamist militancy; Muslims are also subject to government suspicions that they are aiding rebel groups.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

There are no formal restrictions on academic freedom. Primary and secondary school curriculums are regulated but not strongly politicized.

Armed groups have attacked schools, preventing children from accessing education. Schools in the east have also been used to shelter internally displaced persons (IDPs), notably in the North Kivu territory of Rutshuru.

Although open political dissent is routinely suppressed, Congolese publicly express their views on some subjects. Many Congolese openly discuss systemic corruption and insecurity on social media platforms. Authorities in areas under a state of siege crack down on dissent.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, and demonstrations are held regularly in urban areas. However, those who participate risk arrests, beatings, and lethal violence.

Assembly rights are curtailed in areas affected by the state-of-siege declaration; authorities in North Kivu threatened to arrest those participating in a September 2022 protest over the fate of the M23-occupied town of Bunagana.

Violent protests against the continued presence of the UN Stabilization Mission in the DRC (MONUSCO) occurred in July 2022, affecting several cities in the east. Protesters damaged UN offices; in one incident, protesters also damaged the homes of UN workers. Witnesses reported that UN peacekeepers used excessive force in response to clashes. Some 36 people, most of them civilians, were killed nationwide by the time the protests subsided.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Thousands of civil society groups are active in the DRC, but many face obstacles to their work. Citizen movements and pressure groups that demonstrate against insecurity or the ineffectiveness of public services have faced violent repression by authorities. Civil society activists have also faced arrest in areas under a state of siege.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

A number of national labor unions and professional associations, covering parts of the public and private sectors, operate legally in the DRC, but the overwhelming majority of workers are informally employed. Some civil servants and members of state security forces are not permitted to unionize and bargain collectively. Violations of the procedures for a legal strike can result in prison terms. Although employers cannot legally retaliate against workers for union activities, such protections are poorly enforced.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is often seen as corrupt and subject to political manipulation. It often shows bias against the opposition and civil society, while government allies typically enjoy impunity for abuses.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Courts are concentrated in urban areas; rural areas rely on customary courts. Informal justice mechanisms are common throughout the country. Civilians are often tried in military courts, which have weak safeguards for defendants' rights and poor witness-protection mechanisms. These courts are also subject to interference from high-ranking military personnel.

The state of siege in North Kivu and Ituri enacted martial law but only authorized military courts to try criminal, not civilian cases, resulting in growing detentions and stalled judicial cases. Arbitrary arrests and detentions are common, as is prolonged pretrial detention; much of the prison population consists of pretrial detainees. Prisoners frequently pay bribes to avoid torture or meet basic needs; rape among detainees is common.

DRC courts have officially granted reparations to the targets of sexual violence and other serious crimes, but these are rarely paid in practice.

Civilian authorities do not effectively control security forces. The military is notoriously undisciplined; soldiers are known to exchange intelligence and weapons with rebel or militia groups. Soldiers and police regularly commit serious human rights abuses, including rape and other physical attacks, and high-ranking military officials enjoy impunity for crimes. Despite the government's promise to "eradicate" militia groups during the 2021 state of siege, affected areas still suffer widespread violence.

Armed groups have contributed to years of conflict and communal violence that have had a catastrophic impact on civilians, with over five million conflict-related deaths since 1998. Human Rights Watch (HRW) reports that 120 such groups are active in four eastern provinces. M23, which claims to defend ethnic Tutsis against Hutu opponents and last fought in the DRC in the early 2010s, launched a renewed campaign in 2021 and was active in 2022. In June, M23 fighters killed at least 17 people in North Kivu for allegedly reporting their location to government forces. M23 forces later disrupted supply lines serving the city of Goma. In November, the New Humanitarian news outlet reported that 280,000 people had been displaced by the fighting.

In April 2022, EAC member states agreed to launch an armed mission against M23; Burundian troops affiliated with that mission were deployed by August. While the Rwandan government, which is widely believed to support M23, negotiated a truce with Kinshasa in November, M23 fighters did not immediately lay down their arms. In late December, M23 fighters said they would retreat from Kibumba, a strategic town near Goma.

MONUSCO has been active in the DRC since 2010 but Congolese have criticized its performance. Those who participated in the violent July 2022 protests called the mission ineffective, especially in the face of M23, and demanded MONUSCO's immediate withdrawal. In August, the government said it would reconsider the MONUSCO withdrawal plan, under which the mission would continue through 2024. In late December, the UN Security Council voted to extend MONUSCO through the end of 2023.

Although the constitution prohibits discrimination against women, they face discrimination in nearly every aspect of their lives. The family code assigns women a subordinate role in the household.

Ethnic discrimination is common. Kinyarwanda-language speakers and ethnic Tutsis face discrimination and hate speech, which was widely disseminated on social networks during M23's 2022 campaign. Indigenous peoples also face pervasive discrimination and have limited access to public services. In November, President Tshisekedi signed a law meant to expand access to services, address discrimination, and respect land rights.

People with disabilities remain nationally marginalized despite the creation of a ministry dedicated to people with disabilities.

Although homosexuality is not explicitly criminalized, LGBT+ people are marginalized and forced to hide their sexual orientation. Penal-code provisions, including those for "insulting morals" and "offending modesty" have been used against LGBT+ people.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

Freedom of movement is protected by law but seriously curtailed in practice, in large part due to armed conflicts and other security problems. In its July 2022 update, the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs reported there were 5.5 million IDPs in the DRC, 1.2 million being newly displaced during the year to date. Various armed groups and government forces impose illegal tolls on travelers passing through territory under their control.

Individuals have the right to own property and establish private businesses. In conflict zones, armed groups and government soldiers regularly seize private property and destroy homes and businesses. Property ownership and business activity are also hampered by pervasive corruption and a complicated system of taxation and regulation that encourages bribery.

Although the constitution prohibits discrimination against women, some laws and customary practices put women at a disadvantage with respect to inheritance and land ownership.

Sexual and gender-based violence is common. Rebels and government soldiers have regularly been implicated in cases of rape and sexual abuse. Rebel commanders have abducted girls into forced marriages. Convictions for these offenses remain rare. Abortion is prohibited except to save the life of a pregnant woman, and illegal abortions can draw lengthy prison sentences.

The family code obliges wives to obey their husbands, who are designated as the heads of their households. Married women are under the legal guardianship of their husbands. Although the legal minimum age for marriage is 18, many women are married earlier.

Formal protections against economic exploitation are poorly enforced, and most Congolese are informally employed. Although the law prohibits forced or compulsory labor, such practices are common and include forced child labor in mining, street vending, domestic service, and agriculture. Some government forces and armed groups force civilians to work for them, and the recruitment and use of child soldiers remains widespread. Working conditions can be life threatening. Accidents are common in the mining sector, and safety precautions are rarely enforced.

Costa Rica

Population: 5,200,000
Capital: San José
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Costa Rica has a long history of democratic stability, with a multiparty political system and regular rotations of power through credible elections. Freedoms of expression and association are robust. The rule of law is generally strong, though presidents have often been implicated in corruption scandals. Among other ongoing concerns, Indigenous people face discrimination, and land disputes involving Indigenous communities persist.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In April, Rodrigo Chaves of the Social Democratic Progress Party (PPSD) was elected president with 53 percent of the vote, defeating former president José María Figueres of the National Liberation Party (PLN) in the runoff. All elections held during the year were considered free and fair.
- General elections were held in February, and saw the PLN win 19 seats to become the largest party in the legislature, followed by the PPSD with 10 seats. No party won a majority.
- The number of asylum seekers in Costa Rica has risen sharply in recent years; government officials confirmed there were over 200,000 pending asylum applications—as well as 50,000 people waiting to make a formal application—as of September. Approximately 96 percent of those seeking asylum in Costa Rica are from Nicaragua, Venezuela, and Cuba.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected for a four-year term and can seek a nonconsecutive second term. Presidential candidates must win 40 percent of the vote to avoid a runoff. In April 2022, Rodrigo Chaves of the center-right Social Democratic Progress Party (PPSD) was elected president, winning 53 percent of the vote in the runoff to defeat former president José María Figueres of the National Liberation Party (PLN). The elections were free and fair, but both rounds featured a low voter turnout.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Elections for the 57-seat unicameral Legislative Assembly occur every four years. Deputies, elected by proportional representation, may not run for two consecutive terms, but may run again after skipping a term. No party won a majority in the February 2022 general elections, which saw the PLN become the largest party in the legislature after winning 19 seats, followed by the PPSD, which won 10. Four other parties entered the legislature with fewer than 10 seats each.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

A special chamber of the Supreme Court appoints the independent national election commission, the Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE), which is responsible for administering elections. The TSE carries out its functions impartially, and the electoral framework is fair.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

People have the right to organize in different political parties without undue obstacles. The historical dominance of the PLN and the Social Christian Unity Party (PUSC) has waned in recent years as new parties gain traction, leading to the collapse of the traditional two-party system. Both the Liberal Progressive Party, founded in 2016, and the New Republic Party, founded in 2018, won legislative representation for the first time following the February 2022 elections.

Power regularly alternates in Costa Rica, and opposition parties compete fiercely in presidential and legislative elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Citizens' political choices are free from domination by unelected elites and other undemocratic powers.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Members of religious, racial, ethnic, and other minority groups enjoy full political rights. Some groups remain underrepresented in government. Indigenous rights have not historically been prioritized, and there is little representation of Indigenous Costa Ricans, who comprise 2.4 percent of the population. Sonia Rojas Méndez, who was elected to the legislature in February 2022, is the country's first deputy who identifies as an Indigenous woman. Afro–Costa Ricans, who make up almost 8 percent of the population, are also underrepresented in government. Women and women's interests are represented in government, with approximately 47 percent of seats in the Legislative Assembly held by women.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Costa Rica's freely elected government and lawmakers set and implement state policy without interference. However, legislative gridlock remains a systemic issue.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Costa Rica's anticorruption laws are generally well enforced. However, despite the existence of functioning anticorruption mechanisms, nearly every president since 1990 has been accused of corruption after leaving office.

Several high-profile corruption investigations remained ongoing in 2022, including the investigation into the so-called Cochinilla case, a corruption scandal that reportedly involved state agencies accepting bribes from private construction companies in return for government contracts. Similarly, investigations into the Diamante case—an alleged bribery scheme related to public works contracts that led to the 2021 arrests of several politicians—continued during the year. Legal proceedings also advanced in a third high-profile scandal known as the Cementazo case, which was uncovered in 2017 and involved influence peddling related to Chinese cement exports to Costa Rica.

In September 2022, Costa Rica's legislature opened an investigation into allegations that President Chaves's electoral campaign had received illicit funding; Vice President Stephan Brunner was charged for his alleged role in the scheme in October. Chaves has called the allegations politically motivated.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Citizens generally have access to government information. There are some deficiencies in the reporting of budgets to the public, including a lack of transparency in communicating the objectives of the annual budget. Senior government officials are required to make financial disclosures, but that information is not available to the public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 53 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is largely respected in Costa Rica. Defamation laws are on the books, but imprisonment was removed as a punishment for defamation in 2010.

Now president Chaves repeatedly denounced the press in 2022. During his presidential campaign in February, Chaves promised to "destroy" Costa Rican newspaper La Nación and the private television station Canal 7; both outlets had reported on sexual harassment allegations made against him. The Chaves administration has also introduced restrictions on what information government employees can share with members of the media; in August, the director of Costa Rica's journalists' association asked the Constitutional Chamber to nullify newly issued instructions allegedly preventing civil servants from interacting with the press.

In July 2022, the Chaves administration suspended the operating permit for an events arena owned by Grupo La Nación, a business group that owns La Nación. The suspension was perceived by many as retribution for the newspaper's critical reporting on the administration, and was widely criticized by press freedom groups. The Constitutional Chamber annulled the suspension in October.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Roman Catholicism is the official religion, but the constitution guarantees the freedom of religion, which is generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is constitutionally protected and generally upheld.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is free, and the government is not known to surveil the electronic communications of Costa Ricans. However, widespread concern over possible government surveillance arose following the February 2020 publication of an executive decree creating a Presidential Data Analysis Unit (UPAD) with the power to access "confidential information held by public institutions when required." The decree was quickly repealed, and in August 2022, the Constitutional Chamber declared it unconstitutional.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected. This right is largely upheld in practice. A diverse range of groups hold regular rallies and protests without government interference.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), including those engaged in human rights work, are active and do not encounter undue obstacles.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Although labor unions are free to organize and mount frequent protests and strikes with minimal governmental interference, the law requires a minimum of 12 employees to form a union, which may impact union rights at small enterprises. Rates of union membership in the private sector are low, due in part to discrimination by employers against members. Employers occasionally fire workers who attempt to form unions. In 2020, then president Carlos Alvarado Quesada enacted a law restricting strikes by public sector employees, which includes limits on permitted justifications for strikes and salary suspensions for workers who participate in strikes deemed illegal.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judicial branch is generally independent and impartial. Supreme Court judges are elected by a supermajority of the legislature. Prosecutors and judges are able to investigate public officials.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are enshrined in the constitution and are generally protected. However, there are often substantial delays in judicial processes, sometimes resulting in lengthy pretrial detention.

Violent crime has increased in recent years. Authorities estimated a homicide rate of 12 per 100,000 people in 2022. Criminal groups transport drugs along the coasts, and the government has reported that many homicides there are related to organized crime and drug trafficking. There are reports of occasional police abuses of detainees and civilians; confirmed cases are generally investigated and prosecuted.

Overcrowding, poor sanitation, insufficient access to health care, and violence remain serious problems in prisons. Recurrent abuse by prison police has not been thoroughly investigated due to victims' reluctance to file formal complaints.

The constitution outlines equal rights for all people, but rights are upheld unevenly. Indigenous people face discrimination, particularly regarding land rights and access to basic services. In recent years, conflict over land disputes has led to Indigenous groups being targeted by lawsuits and violence. In August 2022, an Indigenous rights organization reported that Indigenous communities and individuals in Costa Rica had been subjected to at least 63 violent attacks in 2021, including incidents of harassment, arson, and physical assault. At least 26 attacks were reportedly perpetrated or permitted by police forces.

Costa Ricans of African descent have faced discrimination in health care, education, and employment. A law recognizing the historical discrimination against Afro–Costa Ricans stipulates that, for a period of 10 years, public institutions must allocate at least 7 percent of vacant positions annually to people of African descent. The law also mandates the inclusion of the legacy of Afro–Costa Ricans in the country's history in public education curriculums.

Women experience discrimination due to entrenched stereotypes, which can limit their equal access to employment, health services, and the justice system. In recent years, femicide laws have been expanded and penalties for the crime increased.

Executive orders prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity. However, law enforcement officials have discriminated against LGBT+ people, and there have been reports of attacks by police on transgender sex workers.

The number of people seeking asylum in Costa Rica has risen sharply in recent years. In September 2022, government officials confirmed there were over 200,000 pending asylum applications, and another 50,000 people waiting to make a formal application. Although the law entitles asylum seekers to access public services, discrimination sometimes prevents such access in practice. In November 2022, President Chaves signed two immigration-related decrees. The first decree, effective at the time of publication, reformed the country's refugee regulations: among other things, refugees will no longer be immediately issued a work permit, and asylum seekers are prohibited from leaving the country while their applications are being processed. The second decree, which had not come into effect as of year-end 2022, provides a way for migrants from Cuba, Venezuela, and Nicaragua—who account for approximately 96 percent of asylum seekers in the country—to regularize their immigration status.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is constitutionally guaranteed. Costa Ricans enjoy relative freedom in their choice of residence and employment. COVID-19-related transit restrictions were lifted in March 2022.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights are generally protected. The business climate is relatively open, and individuals are free to establish businesses, although complicated bureaucracy can deter entrepreneurs from doing so.

Land disputes between Indigenous and non-Indigenous peoples have been a source of conflict for years, and Indigenous groups sometimes face harassing lawsuits and violence. A 1977 Indigenous Law formalized Indigenous groups' exclusive rights to some territories, but the government has failed to implement the law or provide compensation to non-Indigenous settlers who continue to occupy the land.

Despite the existence of domestic violence protections, violence against women and children remains a problem. In 2019, then president Alvarado signed a bill increasing the statute of limitations in child sexual abuse cases from 10 to 25 years, and in 2021 he signed a bill expanding the definition of femicide and increasing the penalties for those convicted of the crime.

In 2020, Costa Rica became the first Central American country to permit same-sex marriage.

Abortion is illegal in Costa Rica except when a woman's health is in danger. In 2019, then president Alvarado signed a technical decree to facilitate limited access to abortion, though conditions remain restrictive.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Despite legal protections, domestic workers are subject to exploitation and forced labor. Employers often ignore minimum wage and social security laws, and fines for violations are insignificant. Child labor is a problem in the informal economy.

Sex trafficking and child sex tourism are serious problems. The US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report highlighted the government's "significant efforts" to combat trafficking, including implementing a national antitrafficking action plan. However, the report also noted that antitrafficking efforts are underfunded, and the government failed to prosecute or convict any labor traffickers in 2021 and 2022.

Côte d'Ivoire

Population: 28,200,000
Capital: Yamoussoukro (official), Abidjan (de facto)
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Côte d'Ivoire continues to recover from an armed conflict that ended in 2011. Several root causes of that conflict remain, including ethnic and regional tensions, land disputes, corruption, and impunity. While an outbreak of violence during the 2020 electoral period represented a significant setback, civil liberties have been better protected in recent years, and civil society and the political opposition have operated more freely since that year's election.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In July, authorities in Mali arrested 49 Ivorian soldiers who arrived to participate in a UN peacekeeping mission there. Forty-six of them received prison sentences for undermining Malian security in December, while three who had been released in September received death sentences in absentia.

- In August, Ivorian authorities placed Pulchérie Gbalet, president of the Ivorian Citizens Alternative (ACI) civil society group, in pretrial detention and accused her of colluding with a foreign power. Gbalet had called on the Ivorian government to negotiate for the release of the soldiers detained in Mali and visited that country before her arrest; she remained in custody in Côte d'Ivoire at year's end.
- Also in August, President Alassane Ouattara offered a pardon to former president Laurent Gbagbo, who faced a prison sentence over allegations that he stole assets from the Central Bank of West African States (BCEAO) during the 2010–11 conflict.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 19 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 6 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The October 2020 presidential election, in which President Alassane Ouattara won a third term, was neither free nor fair. Rally of the Houphouëtists for Democracy and Peace (RHDP) presidential candidate and former prime minister Amadou Gon Coulibaly died unexpectedly that July. President Ouattara, who had spent two five-year terms in office, reversed his previous decision not to run; he was nominated that August by the RHDP, which claimed Ouattara was eligible for two more terms because the 2016 constitution's two-term limit was adopted after Ouattara won his second term. Some critics charged that Ouattara had moved forward with the new constitution to enable his third term. His nomination was met by major protests from opposition parties.

The Constitutional Council validated the candidacy of only four individuals: Ouattara, Henri Konan Bédié, Pascal Affi N'Guessan, and Bertin Konan Kouadio. Rejected candidates were unable to appeal, and the government ignored an African Court of Human and People's Rights (ACHPR) ruling to allow former prime minister Guillaume Soro and former president Laurent Gbagbo to run. Several leading opposition parties, including those of Soro and Gbagbo, refused to participate in the polls and called for boycotts and protests. The government banned public demonstrations throughout the election period, and those that occurred were met with violence. The campaign period itself was marred by instances of violence between progovernment and antigovernment supporters, resulting in dozens of deaths.

The opposition boycotted the election outright, while many would-be voters were prevented from casting ballots due to security concerns. Ouattara won 94 percent of the vote on a turnout of 54 percent according to the government. These numbers were contested by independent observers from the Electoral Institute for Sustainable Democracy in Africa (EISA), which reported that only 54 percent of polling stations opened and only 41 percent of voter cards were distributed before the polls. The EISA also voiced concerns over the comprehensiveness of electoral-roll data, noting that the roll included a large number of deceased individuals; claimed the election commission lacked transparency; and said the commission heavily favored the RHDP in administering the election.

The prime minister is the head of government, is appointed by the president, and is responsible for designating a cabinet which is also approved by the president. Patrick Achi was appointed in 2021 following the death of former prime minister Hamed Bakayoko. Achi and his cabinet resigned in April 2022; Achi was reappointed that month to preside over a smaller group of ministers.

The bicameral parliament consists of a 255-seat lower house, the National Assembly, and a 99-seat Senate, which was envisaged by the 2016 constitution and seated in 2018. National Assembly members are directly elected to five-year terms. Some 66 senators are indirectly elected by the National Assembly and members of various local councils, while the president appoints the other 33; all 99 serve five-year terms.

A transparent, credible, and peaceful lower-house election was held in March 2021. Candidates from several opposition parties and coalitions, including most of those that had boycotted the October 2020 presidential elections, took part. However, the Soro-led Generations and People in Solidarity (GPS) party did not participate in either the presidential or the parliamentary elections.

The RHDP won an absolute majority, taking 139 seats but suffering a net loss compared to its 167-seat contingent in the last parliament. An opposition coalition of the Democratic Party of Côte d'Ivoire–African Democratic Rally (PDCI-RDA) and the pro-Gbagbo Together for Democracy and Solidarity (EDS) won 80. Ten seats went to other party lists and groups, while 22 were won by independents. Despite the increased opposition participation and peaceful conduct of the polls, turnout remained low at 37.8 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

In 2016, the ACHPR ruled that the Independent Electoral Commission (CEI) was biased in favor of the government and ordered amendments to the electoral law. President Ouattara conceded to the CEI's reorganization, increasing the number of civil society members in the CEI from four to six by parliamentary amendment in 2019. Civil society criticized the reforms, warning that the government would still exert influence due to its continued nominating powers, and changes that could make the body more independent were only partially implemented. Ruling party members were largely left to run the CEI due to staff changes, allegations of irregularities in appointment and other procedures, and opposition boycotts that affected district-level staffing.

In April 2020, the government amended the electoral code by emergency executive ordinance—enabled via COVID-19 emergency measures—without consulting candidates. The updated electoral roll was opaque and regionally unbalanced; the CEI refused to report detailed data or submit to an independent audit. That July, the ACHPR ruled that Côte d'Ivoire must take steps to further reform the CEI, including the nominating process, to reduce potential government influence over nominations.

The post-2016 changes have improved electoral competition, though the Ivorian electoral framework still contains weaknesses and dissatisfaction over recent reforms has persisted. Opposition groups have more recently participated in the CEI's central commission after reforms allowed political parties with significant parliamentary representation to receive seats. Opposition candidates were also able to participate in the 2021 parliamentary elections without facing arbitrary rejection by electoral administration bodies.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16

The Ivorian constitution permits multiparty competition. Recent presidential and legislative elections have been contested by a large number of parties and independent candidates. The ruling RHDP, dominated by Ouattara's Rally of the Republicans (RDR), holds a virtual lock on political power but has faced increased competition in recent years. In 2018, the PDCI of former president Bédié broke away from a coalition with the RHDP. Guillaume Soro, meanwhile, formed the GPS after being pressured into resigning as National Assembly speaker in 2019.

In contrast to the 2020 presidential elections—which had been boycotted by several leading opposition parties—competition improved in 2021, with multiple parties participating in that year's parliamentary elections.

More parties have been formed since those polls. In June 2021, former president Laurent Gbagbo returned to Côte d'Ivoire after 10 years, following his acquittal by the International Criminal Court (ICC) on charges of crimes against humanity; he launched the African People's Party–Côte d'Ivoire, a left-wing pan-African party, that October. The Ivorian Popular Front, which he founded in exile in 1982, remains active. Former first lady Simone Ehivet Gbagbo formed the Movement of Capable Generations (MGC) in 2021 and was named party leader in August 2022.

Opposition parties have little chance of gaining power without reforming the electoral framework, which favors the ruling party. The RHDP has an absolute majority in the National Assembly, limiting the opposition's ability to pursue such reforms.

Opposition groups' chances to meaningfully contest the 2020 presidential election were dashed that August when the Constitutional Council rejected the candidacy of 40 of the 44 parties and individuals who submitted a nomination, including Soro and Laurent Gbagbo. International observer missions noted there was no appeals process for rejected candidates. The government ignored the ACHPR's ruling to accept Soro's and Gbagbo's candidacies. Opposition figures were arrested and detained by security forces after the 2020 election took place, while dissidents were arrested for participating in protests during that year's electoral period.

Individuals faced intimidation, threats, and physical violence when participating in the 2020 presidential election. Those who held protests despite the government's ban faced forceful reprisals, with several demonstrators being killed during the campaigning period. Members of leading civil society institutions, like academics, suggested that participating in public debate about the elections would be seen as protest by their superiors.

Supporters of the opposition faced threats from the police and the military, while militia members engaged in violence and enjoyed impunity. Party-linked militias refrained from such violence during the relatively peaceful and transparent March 2021 parliamentary elections, however.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Citizenship has been a source of tension since the 1990s, when Ivorian nationalists adopted former president Bédié's concept of "Ivoirité" to exclude perceived foreigners, including Ouattara, from the political process. A law relaxing some conditions for citizenship went into effect in 2014 but its application remains uneven. Hundreds of thousands of individuals, mostly northerners, lack documentation.

Women are poorly represented in the parliament, holding 13.7 percent of National Assembly seats and 21.4 percent of the Senate as of December 2022.

A north-south, Muslim-Christian schism has been a salient feature of Ivorian life for decades and was exacerbated by the 2002–11 crisis. However, the schism has since receded, and the current governing coalition includes Muslims and Christians. Political parties are not ethnically homogenous—Côte d'Ivoire comprises people from more than 60 ethnicities—though each tends to be dominated by specific ethnic groups.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

Though defense and security forces are nominally under civilian control, problems of parallel command and control systems within the armed forces, known as the Republican Forces of Côte d'Ivoire, remain significant. In 2016, the government instituted a law meant to reduce the size of the officer corps and refine the military's command structure, but these changes have largely gone unimplemented. Nonstate armed actors and former rebels enjoy significant influence, especially in the north and west.

Mutinies in 2017 exposed the fragility of the civilian government's control over the military. Civilian control was tested again in 2019, when special forces members scuffled with Abidjan police in an effort to free an arrested colleague; this incident ended without violence.

Opposition parties openly participated in legislative processes in 2022, an improvement over previous years. Opposition parliamentarians cast ballots when the National Assembly elected Adama Bictogo as its speaker in June, for example.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption and bribery remain endemic, and particularly affect the judiciary, police, and government contracting operations. Petty bribery also hampers citizens' access to services ranging from obtaining a birth certificate to clearing goods through customs. The High Authority for Good Governance (HABG), a public anticorruption body, is considered ineffective. Perpetrators at all levels seldom face prosecution.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The government generally awards contracts in a nontransparent manner. Access to up-to-date information from government ministries is difficult for ordinary citizens to acquire, although some ministries do publish information online. Enforcement of a 2013 access-to-information law has been inconsistent. The HABG requires public officials to submit asset declarations, but this is not well enforced.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 30 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Conditions for the press have improved since the end of the 2010–11 conflict. However, journalists face intimidation and occasional violence by security forces in connection with their work. Most national media sources, especially newspapers, exhibit partisanship in their news coverage, consistently favoring either the government or the opposition. Reporters Without Borders (RSF) noted that RHDP supporters own the country's three private television networks.

While serious violence against journalists was rare after the end of the 2010–11 conflict, many journalists were arrested, detained, and beaten by police while covering protests and violence during and after the 2020 election period.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Legal guarantees of religious freedom are typically upheld, and individuals are free to practice their faith in public and private. Relations between Muslims and Christians worsened due to the 2002–11 crisis, but tensions have largely receded.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Public universities were closed and used as military bases during the 2010–11 conflict and now suffer from a lack of adequate resources and facilities.

Academics faced threats and intimidation if they addressed or critiqued the ruling party and other politically sensitive topics during the 2020 election cycle. Legal scholars were unable to organize a public debate on the constitutionality of President Ouattara's third term, as many feared their participation would be considered a form of illegal protest. Self-censorship persists at institutions led by RHDP supporters and for fear of repression by government agencies.

While people are free to engage in political discussion and debate, politics and the ruling party became dangerous topics during the 2020 election cycle. During and after the elections, militias and unknown actors attacked opposition supporters demonstrating and meeting during the opposition's boycott of the presidential election. Security forces largely overlooked the violence against opposition supporters, which discouraged individuals from openly expressing their political views. While Ivorians' ability to speak openly greatly improved after that election, self-censorship remains common and some political discussions still carry a risk of harassment for participants.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly was restricted via 2019 criminal code revisions, which include one- to three-year prison sentences for organizing "undeclared or prohibited" assemblies and a vague definition of "public order" that can be broadly interpreted by authorities.

President Ouattara banned public demonstrations and protests throughout the 2020 election period. Police violently dispersed protests and other acts of civil disobedience that stemmed from the opposition's election boycott; more than 50 people were killed because of violence at public demonstrations. Demonstrations that occurred in subsequent years were not subjected to such violence or interference.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Domestic and international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally free to operate. However, poor security conditions, especially in north and west, are a constraint for some organizations.

Pulchérie Gbalet of the ACI was placed in pretrial detention in August 2022; Gbalet had called on the Ivorian government to negotiate for the release of 49 soldiers held in Mali and had visited that country. Prosecutors accused Gbalet of "agreeing with the agents of a foreign power" for her statements. Gbalet remained in custody in Côte d'Ivoire at year's end.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The right to organize and join labor unions is constitutionally guaranteed. Workers have the right to bargain collectively. Strikes are common occurrences, though some have become violent.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is not independent, and judges are highly susceptible to external interference and bribes. Processes governing the assignment of cases to judges are opaque. The courts generally adjudicate cases in accordance with the ruling party's political interests; the judiciary was fully mobilized to support President Ouattara's third term and remains supportive of his policies.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees equal access to justice and due process for all citizens, but these guarantees are poorly upheld in practice. The state struggles to provide attorneys to defendants who cannot afford legal counsel. Security officials are susceptible to bribery and are rarely held accountable for misconduct. Prolonged pretrial detention is a serious problem for both adults and minors, with some detainees spending years in prison without trial. In 2018, the lower house adopted a new Code of Criminal Procedure that included a circuit of criminal courts to address the backlog.

Physical violence against civilians in the form of extortion, banditry, and sexual violence—sometimes perpetrated by members of the armed forces—remain common. Disputes over land use and ownership between migrants and those who claim customary land rights sometimes turn violent. The country's prisons are severely overcrowded, and incarcerated adults and minors are not always separated.

Concerns about impunity, victor's justice, and reconciliation have persisted after the close of the 2010–11 conflict. To date, only a handful of individuals have been put on trial for crimes committed during that period, and most prosecutions have focused on figures associated with Gbagbo. In 2018, Ouattara pardoned 800 people accused or convicted of committing violent acts during the 2010–11 conflict, including former first lady Simone Ehivet Gbagbo, ostensibly to foster reconciliation. In 2019, Laurent Gbagbo was acquitted of crimes against humanity during the 2010–11 conflict by the ICC and was conditionally released; he returned to Côte d'Ivoire in 2021 after the acquittal was upheld. In August 2022, President Ouattara offered a pardon to Laurent Gbagbo, who faced a 20-year sentence related to the alleged robbery of BCEAO assets during the 2010–11 conflict. Ouattara cited the need for "social cohesion" when announcing that offer.

Terrorist attacks have occurred in the north of country, along the borders with Burkina Faso and Mali, in recent years. In 2021, the head of the General Directorate for External Security (DGSE), a French intelligence agency, warned that terrorist groups were planning to expand their operations in Côte d'Ivoire. The Ivorian government increased its budget for antiterrorism programs in the north that December.

Côte d'Ivoire has participated in the UN Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali (MINUSMA); in July 2022, Malian authorities arrested 49 Ivorian soldiers who Abidjan said were sent to take part in MINUSMA. Forty-six of them received prison sentences for undermining Malian security in December, while three who had been released in September received death sentences in absentia. In November, the Ivorian government announced it would end its participation in the peacekeeping mission by August 2023.

Same-sex relations are not criminalized in Côte d'Ivoire, but LGBT+ people can face prosecution under criminal code language amended in 2019 that references "unnatural acts" and "moral sensitivity." No law prohibits discrimination based on sexual orientation. LGBT+ people face societal prejudice as well as harassment by state security forces.

Intercommunal tensions over land rights frequently involve migrants from neighboring countries, who sometimes experience violent intimidation.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Freedom of movement has improved since 2011. However, irregular checkpoints and acts of extortion continue in some areas, particularly in the west and north, and near gold- and diamond-producing regions. The government's efforts to combat these practices have been undermined by inconsistent financial support and a failure to investigate and prosecute perpetrators. Women are generally afforded equal freedom of movement, though risks of insecurity and sexual violence hinder this in practice.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Citizens have the right to own and establish private businesses, and the country has attracted significant investment since 2011. However, property and land rights remain weak, especially in the west, where conflict over land tenure remains a significant source of tension. Under a marriage law passed in 2019, women are legally entitled to use inherited property as collateral for loans. Migrants may be discriminated over land issues even though they have legal documents of their property title.

Women suffer significant legal and economic discrimination, and sexual and gender-based violence are widespread. According to a 2019 survey carried out by Citizens for the Promotion and Defense of the Rights of Children, Women and Minorities (CPDEFM), an Ivorian NGO, more than 70 percent of women in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire's largest city, have been victims of domestic violence.

Legal protections from gender-based violence are weak and are often ignored. Impunity for perpetrators also remains a problem, and when it is prosecuted, rape is routinely reclassified as indecent assault. Costly medical certificates are often essential for convictions yet are beyond the means of victims who are impoverished.

Child marriage is historically widespread, though the 2019 marriage law set the minimum age for marriage at 18 for both sexes. Customary and religious marriages, more common outside urban areas, were not affected by the law. The law also banned same-sex marriage.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Despite efforts by the government and international industries in recent years to counter the phenomenon, child labor is a frequent problem, particularly in the cocoa industry. Human trafficking is prohibited by the constitution, but government programs for victims of trafficking—often children—are inadequate.

In the 2022 edition of its Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department reported that the government was successfully convicting more traffickers and identifying more victims, but also reported that victims receive insufficient shelter or services.

Croatia

Population: 3,800,000
Capital: Zagreb
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Croatia is a parliamentary republic that regularly holds free elections. Civil and political rights are generally respected, though corruption in the public sector is a serious issue. The Roma and ethnic Serbs face discrimination, as do LGBT+ people. In recent years, concerns about the presence of far-right groups and figures espousing discriminatory values in public life have increased.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Construction Minister Darko Horvat was arrested in February over his suspected involvement in a plan to route government subsidies to companies that did not qualify, prompting Prime Minister Andrej Plenković to dismiss him from the cabinet. In October, the Croatian anticorruption authority indicted Horvat and three other former ministers over their alleged participation, along with three officials and a former mayor.
- In August, authorities arrested five people over their alleged involvement in a scheme to resell natural gas at inflated prices. The scheme affected energy firm INA, which the government maintains a significant minority stake in. Opposition lawmakers called on Plenković and the cabinet to resign over the affair in September, noting that supporters of the ruling Croatian Democratic Union (HDZ) allegedly took part.
- In July, the European Union (EU) approved Croatia's application to use the euro as its currency, replacing the kuna. Croatia is due to use the euro and join the Schengen Area, where member states do not employ internal border checks, in 2023.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40 (−1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who is head of state, is elected by popular vote for a maximum of two five-year terms. Former Social Democratic Party (SDP) prime minister Zoran Milanović defeated incumbent Kolinda Grabar-Kitarović in the second round of the country's presidential elections in January 2020, winning 52.7 percent of the vote. Voter turnout was 55 percent.

The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the president with parliamentary approval. Andrej Plenković, who chairs the conservative HDZ, remained prime minister after the party won the July 2020 legislative elections.

Members of the 151-seat, unicameral Hrvatski sabor (Croatian Parliament) are elected to four-year terms.

The HDZ captured 66 seats in the July 2020 parliamentary elections, which enabled it to form a coalition government with two smaller parties. The main opposition party, the SDP, won 41 seats, the far-right Homeland Movement secured 16, and the left-wing We Can took 8. Though the elections were deemed free and fair, ethnic Serb candidates experienced harassment during the campaign.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

While concerns about the use of public funds for political campaigns persist, the State Election Commission implements robust electoral laws effectively.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Citizens may freely organize and participate in the activities of a wide variety of political parties. A slate of new right- and left-wing populist parties and candidates emerged in the 2019 European Parliament elections. Two new coalitions made breakthroughs in the July 2020 parliamentary polls: the far-right Homeland Movement and the left-wing We Can.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The SDP-led opposition coalition holds a significant bloc of parliamentary seats and is generally able to operate free from restrictions or intimidation. However, the HDZ has dominated politics and draws support from the Catholic Church, veterans, and a growing number of conservative nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). The SDP-led bloc has won the most seats in only two parliamentary elections since 1991, although the country was headed by non-HDZ executives between 2000 and 2015. SDP-backed candidates served as president from 2010 to 2015 and again since 2020. President Milanović, who was elected in 2020, campaigned from the right instead of relying only on the SDP's traditional base of support.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

While voters and candidates are generally able to freely express their political choices, many public servants obtained their positions through patronage networks and risk becoming beholden to a party or special interest group as a result. Patronage networks are particularly influential in Zagreb, which was under the almost-continuous stewardship of HDZ-affiliated mayor Milan Bandić—considered one of the country's most powerful politicians—between 2000 and his death in 2021. Bandić's tenure was marked by corruption accusations and credible allegations of improper hiring practices and public procurement deals.

The influential Catholic Church associates with conservative and far-right civil society groups, which have become more influential in local politics in recent years. Veterans' groups are also significant, especially in regard to the still-contentious discourse surrounding the 1991–95 Independence War and the position of ethnic Serbs in Croatian society.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Eight parliamentary seats are set aside for ethnic minorities, including three for ethnic Serbs. However, the political interests of marginalized groups, notably Roma and Serbs, are underrepresented. Another three seats are reserved for Croatian citizens in the diaspora, including ethnic Croats in neighboring Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH).

Women are represented across political parties, and women have held Croatia's presidency between 2015 and 2019 and the prime minister's office between 2009 and 2011. However, the number of women in the parliament decreased in 2016 after the Constitutional Court struck down a law requiring 40 percent of a party's candidates be women. In the 2020 parliamentary election, 35 women won seats in the parliament.

Ethnic Serbs in public office are subjected to mistreatment, with Independent Democratic Serb Party (SDSS) leader Milorad Pupovac receiving verbal attacks in recent years. SDS election posters have been defaced during both European Parliament and Croatian elections.

Societal discrimination discourages LGBT+ people from participating in politics, and elements of the political establishment have espoused discriminatory attitudes in their activism.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12 (−1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Democratically elected representatives are duly installed into office and are generally able to make public policy without undue external influence or pressure.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4 (−1)

A criminal code in effect since 2013 enforces stiffer penalties for various forms of corruption. While some progress has been made, official corruption—including nepotism, bribery, fraud, and patronage—remains a serious problem. The European Commission singled out corruption as a major issue facing the country. Croatia's anticorruption mechanisms have been strengthened during the 21st century, with specialized anticorruption courts being established and the Bureau for Combating Corruption and Organized Crime (USKOK) gaining new powers. Nevertheless, local NGOs have observed that corruption has worsened since Croatia's 2013 accession into the EU.

Croatian and European authorities continued to grapple with major corruption cases in 2022. In February, police arrested Construction Minister Darko Horvat, who was accused of directing subsidies to companies that did not qualify for support when he held a different cabinet post. Prime Minister Plenković dismissed Horvat but called on prosecutors to explain Horvat's arrest, calling it disproportionate. Also in February, Deputy Prime Minister and SDSS member Boris Milošević resigned his post after being implicated in Horvat's alleged manipulation of subsidies. In October, Horvat, Milošević, former labor minister Josip Aladrović, and former minister Tomislav Tolušić were all indicted by the USKOK, along with three officials and a former mayor.

In August 2022, authorities arrested five people over their suspected involvement in a natural-gas reselling scheme that affected energy firm INA, in which the government holds a large minority stake. Authorities also froze the individuals' assets, which totaled over 800 million kuna ($110.8 million), that month. Opposition parliamentarians called on Plenković and the cabinet to resign in September, noting the involvement of HDZ supporters in the alleged scheme.

In late December 2022, the European Public Prosecutor's Office indicted former minister Gabrijela Žalac, former Central Finance and Contracting Agency head Tomislav Petric, and two businesspeople for corruption. The four were originally arrested in 2021 over allegations that they manipulated public tenders. In November 2022, the Telegram.hr news outlet reported that Žalac used public funds for a birthday party in 2019.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to systemic corruption among government ministers and officials.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The 2013 Law on the Right of Access to Information created a proportionality and public-interest test designed to balance reasons for disclosing information and reasons for restricting it. It also established an independent information commissioner to monitor compliance. However, government bodies do not always release requested information in a timely manner. Government officials and businesspeople have also interacted in a nontransparent manner; in 2017, for example, a government minister crafted a law addressing the fate of troubled agricultural company Agrokor in private, unofficial meetings.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 49 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Media in Croatia is highly polarized but generally free from overt political interference or manipulation. However, journalists face threats, harassment, and occasional attacks—sometimes at the hands of police—which has created an atmosphere of self-censorship. A 2020 European Commission report warned about deteriorating media freedoms in Croatia. The European Federation of Journalists (EFJ) and local journalist associations have warned of growing political pressure and attacks on the Croatian press under the HDZ government. In 2021, the EFJ criticized the widespread use of strategic lawsuits against public participation (SLAPPs) in Croatia.

Prime Minister Plenković and President Milanović have both engaged in acrimonious exchanges with local and regional media. In a video recorded in 2019 and made public in September 2022, Plenković threatened to assault the late journalist Mislav Bago for interrupting him.

The Croatian constitution guarantees freedom of religion, which is generally upheld in practice. However, the small Serb Orthodox community remains vulnerable to harassment, and members have reported vandalism of their churches.

Jewish communities and other groups have expressed increasing concern about Holocaust denial and displays by right-wing nationalists of symbols and slogans associated with the fascist Ustaša regime that ruled Croatia during the Second World War. Far-right groups, newspapers, and academics have advanced revisionist accounts of the Ustaša period in recent years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

While there are generally no overt restrictions on speech in classrooms, critics continue to allege inappropriate political interference at all levels of education. While aspects of a long-planned modernization of school curriculums were approved by the parliament in 2018, the HDZ has long sought to delay the updates and has moved to install its own members into the group tasked with developing its policies—including extremely conservative members opposed to sex education.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to engage in discussions of a sensitive nature without fearing surveillance or retribution, although there have been some reports of police arresting individuals voicing criticism of the government.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected and respected in Croatia.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

NGOs in Croatia are robust, active, and free from restrictions. However, many groups have complained of growing political pressure from parts of the government and the HDZ against journalists and civil society activists.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The constitution allows workers to form and join trade unions, and this right is generally respected in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

While judicial independence is generally respected, there have been recent concerns about the influence of extreme right-wing groups on the judiciary. Critics allege the courts have been ruling in line with the views of right-wing NGOs and the HDZ, while the courts maintain that they are redressing partisan rulings of the Yugoslav communist era. Judges have also faced corruption allegations in recent years; three judges were arrested in 2021 over bribery accusations lodged by football club administrator Zdravko Mamić, who himself was convicted of corruption in absentia in 2018.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are generally upheld, but the system tends to work more efficiently for individuals with abundant resources or high social standing.

The International Commission on Missing Persons has criticized Croatia for its slow progress in identifying human remains of victims of the 1991–95 conflicts and in making reparations to survivors and their families.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Violence by state and nonstate actors is uncommon. In March 2022, however, a Soviet-era drone crashed in a Zagreb neighborhood. The device's operator was unknown as it bore both Soviet and Ukrainian markings, but no one was injured in the crash.

Prison conditions do not meet international standards due to overcrowding and inadequate medical care.

Ethnic and religious minorities and LGBT+ people in Croatia face discrimination. A group of NGOs criticized the government for lacking a comprehensive human rights policy in 2018 and warned of the continuing deterioration of protection of human rights in the country, especially for marginalized groups and women. According to a 2021 Council of Europe report on the protection of national minorities, ethnic Serbs continue to face high levels of discrimination.

Analysts have expressed concerns that the increasing visibility of far-right, nationalist groups has allowed discriminatory rhetoric to spread. Occasionally, the government's actions suggest their endorsement of far-right groups, and observers have expressed concern that the government has tacitly approved of discriminatory behavior. The Croatian Defense Forces (HOS), a right-wing militia that uses Ustaša-era and other fascist symbols, has maintained ties with HDZ members in recent years. In April 2022, a group of students in the Slavonia region were photographed wearing HOS paraphernalia and offering fascist salutes with their teacher present.

The constitution prohibits gender discrimination, but women earn less than men for comparable work and hold fewer leadership positions.

Police have engaged in violence, including sexual violence and torture in some cases, against migrants, refugees, and asylum seekers. Police have also engaged in illegal pushbacks along the border with BiH. Pushbacks are reportedly less common than in the past, but the practice persists; in a May 2022 report, the Border Violence Monitoring Network noted that Croatian police entered BiH territory while pushing people back across the border.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is protected by the constitution and upheld in practice. People may freely change their place of residence, employment, or education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights are generally well protected. However, corruption can inhibit normal business operations.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

In 2014, following a 2013 referendum that banned same-sex marriage, the parliament passed a law allowing same-sex civil unions. The law affords same-sex couples equal rights in inheritance, social benefits, and taxation. In April 2021, an administrative court in Zagreb ruled that same-sex couples have the right to adopt children. The ruling was confirmed by a higher court in May 2022.

Domestic violence remains a concern. Convictions for rape and domestic violence can bring lengthy prison terms, although Amnesty International noted that the vast majority of cases receive sentences of one year or less. Police sometimes fail to adhere to recommended procedures for handling domestic violence reports.

In 2018, lawmakers ratified the Istanbul Convention, a treaty on preventing and combating gender-based and domestic violence. The treaty was unpopular among conservative and far-right groups who believed its tenets could lead to the legal introduction of same-sex marriage, a third gender category, or school curriculum changes. In response, the government offered a statement saying the treaty's adoption would not change the legal definition of marriage. Amnesty International criticized the Croatian government for failing to harmonize its legislative and policy framework with the treaty's terms.

Abortion is legal, but is restricted to cases of rape, incest, or serious health problems for the pregnant person or fetus after 10 weeks. Croatian doctors face pressure to refrain from performing the procedure. In May 2022, a Croatian woman whose fetus was diagnosed with an aggressive tumor was only able to receive an abortion after a medical commission ruled in her favor. Four hospitals had declined to assist the woman, who was advised to travel to Slovenia.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Worker protection laws are robust, and the Office of the Labor Inspectorate actively investigates work sites. However, labor violations remain a problem within the hospitality sector. Workers in the informal sector have less access to legal protections.

Human trafficking remains a problem, sentences for those convicted of it can be light, and witness statements are not always given appropriate consideration in court cases.

Cuba

Population: 11,100,000
Capital: Havana
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Cuba's one-party communist state outlaws political pluralism, bans independent media, suppresses dissent, and severely restricts basic civil liberties. The government continues to dominate the economy despite recent reforms that permit some private-sector activity. The regime's undemocratic character has not changed despite a generational transition in political leadership between 2018 and 2021 that included the introduction of a new constitution.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Government repression against activists, political opponents, and those who took part in the 2021 social protests continued throughout the year.
- The country's economic crisis deepened with growing inflation during the year, resulting in food shortages and frequent power cuts that triggered popular protests in the summer and fall. Many protests were characterized by violent state repression against demonstrators; a number of protesters were detained, and some have been criminally charged for participating in the demonstrations.

- A national referendum on a new family code passed in September with 67 percent of the vote, recognizing same-sex marriage and the right of same-sex couples to adopt or be beneficiaries of assisted reproduction techniques.
- A new penal code was approved in May and entered into force in December. Among other things, it criminalizes the receipt of foreign financing to carry out activism and increases the minimum penalties for charges typically used to suppress dissent, such as "public disorder."

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Under the 2019 constitution, the president and vice president of the republic are chosen to serve up to two five-year terms by the National Assembly. The prime minister and the Council of Ministers are designated by the National Assembly upon the president's recommendation. In practice, these processes ratify candidates who have been preselected by the Communist Party of Cuba (PCC).

Miguel Díaz-Canel Bermúdez was elected president of the republic under the new constitutional system in a nearly unanimous National Assembly vote in October 2019. That December, he named Manuel Marrero Cruz prime minister. National Assembly president Juan Esteban Lazo Hernández became president of the Council of State, Cuba's top executive office under the old constitution, in October 2019, succeeding Díaz-Canel.

Raúl Castro Ruz, who preceded Díaz-Canel as president of the Council of State, continued to wield considerable power as PCC first secretary. However, Castro retired from that post during the April 2021 party congress and was succeeded by Díaz-Canel. Castro maintains significant influence despite his retirement.

The unicameral National Assembly is directly elected to serve five-year terms, but a PCC-controlled commission designates all candidates, presenting voters with a single candidate for each seat. Those who receive more than 50 percent of the valid votes cast are deemed elected. The National Assembly in turn selects members of the Council of State, a body that exercises legislative power between the assembly's two brief annual sessions. In the 2018 National Assembly elections, all 605 of the approved candidates were deemed elected.

Elections for municipal assemblies held in November 2022 were marked by historically low voter turnout. The elections reportedly featured only one opposition candidate out of the more than 26,000 nominated, leading opposition groups to call for a boycott of the polls.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The only Cuban elections that offer a choice of more than one candidate per office are those for municipal assemblies, but no campaigning is allowed. This did not change under the electoral law unanimously approved in 2019 following ratification of the new constitution, which retained the system of PCC-controlled electoral and candidacy commissions. However, the new law eliminated provincial assemblies, calling instead for municipal assemblies to approve provincial governors proposed by the president, and cut the number of National Assembly delegates to 474 as of the 2023 elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

The constitution identifies the PCC as the "superior driving force of society and the state." All other political parties are illegal. Political dissent is a punishable offense, and dissidents are systematically harassed, detained, physically assaulted, and imprisoned for minor infractions. Supposedly spontaneous mob attacks, known as "acts of repudiation," are often used to silence political dissidents. Madrid-based nongovernmental organization (NGO) Prisoners Defenders reported that more than 1,000 political prisoners were being held by Cuban authorities as of the end of November 2022. That number far exceeds the figures of other allied and similar regimes in Latin America, including Nicaragua and Venezuela.

The PCC has monopolized government and politics in Cuba since the mid-1960s, allowing no electoral competition and preventing any alternative force from succeeding it through a democratic transfer of power. Security forces suppressed opposition activity during both the February 2019 constitutional referendum and the October 2019 election of Díaz-Canel. Municipal elections held in November 2022 featured only one opposition candidate out of the more than 26,000 nominated; earlier that month, opposition groups, who said that the government had blocked opposition candidates from participating, called on voters to boycott the polls.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The authoritarian one-party system in Cuba excludes the public from any genuine, autonomous political participation. Intelligence agencies play an important role in suppressing dissent and wield deep influence over virtually every aspect of the state. Members of dissident groups and even independent actors in the arts, journalism, and other fields are systematically surveilled and periodically interrogated in order to silence them or turn them into informants.

State employees who express political dissent or disagreement with the authorities often face harassment or summary dismissal. Professionals dismissed from their jobs in the state sector have difficulty continuing their careers.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The PCC leadership has exhibited greater gender and racial diversity in recent years. However, since political rights are denied to all Cuban citizens, women, Afro-Cubans, and members of other demographic groups are unable to choose their representatives or organize independently to assert their political interests.

Women hold more than half of the 605 National Assembly seats. However, women held only 3 seats in the 12-seat Political Bureau of the PCC Central Committee during the April 2021 party congress. Cubans of African and mixed-race descent are well represented in the legislature. Lazo, an Afro-Cuban PCC stalwart, simultaneously holds the powerful positions of National Assembly president and head of the Council of State.

The political interests of LGBT+ people are not well represented. Some public advocacy is permitted, but only with the permission of the PCC.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

None of Cuba's nominally elected officials are chosen through free and fair contests, and major policy decisions are reserved for the PCC leadership in practice. The National Assembly, which the constitution describes as the "supreme organ of state power," has little independent influence, meets for brief sessions twice a year, and votes unanimously on nearly all matters before it.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem in Cuba, with widespread illegality permeating everyday life. The state enjoys a monopoly on most large business transactions, and there are no independent mechanisms to hold officials accountable for wrongdoing.

The government has at times pursued anticorruption campaigns, and long prison sentences have been imposed on high-level Cuban officials and foreign businessmen found guilty of corruption-related charges. However, internal reforms that would make the system more transparent and less prone to abuse have been rejected. The authorities do not tolerate civil society groups, independent journalists, or independent courts that might serve as external checks on government malfeasance.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Cuba lacks effective laws that provide for freedom of information and access to official records. Decree Law 6 of 2020 allows individuals to request data from the national statistics office; in practice, however, officials can decline such requests.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 11 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Cuba has one of the most restrictive media environments in the world. The formal media sector is owned and controlled by the state, and the constitution prohibits privately owned media. The country's independent press operates outside the law, its publications are considered "enemy propaganda," and its journalists are routinely harassed, detained, interrogated, threatened, defamed in the official press, and prohibited from traveling abroad. Government agents regularly accuse them of being mercenaries and even terrorists, and many face charges of "usurpation of legal capacity," "diffusion of false news," or other vaguely defined offenses. Journalists at state-owned outlets engage in similar discourse when discussing dissidents; in April 2021, television presenter Humberto López called for members of the dissident San Isidro Movement (MSI) and 27N artist collectives to be charged with "treason against the homeland," a capital offense.

The government closely monitors and persecutes perceived dissidents within the artistic community, mainstream artists, and media figures who air independent or critical views. In May 2021, authorities forcefully entered the home of MSI member Luis Manuel Otero Alcántra—who began a hunger strike over the seizure and destruction of artwork in April—and sent him to a hospital. Otero was discharged at the end of May but was arrested on July 11, as protests were held nationwide.

In mid-May 2021, MSI cofounder Maykel Castillo Pérez, who coproduced and performed the antigovernment song "Patria y Vida" ("Homeland and Life") along with Otero, was detained by the authorities and charged with crimes including "resistance" and "contempt." Both Castillo and Otero were held in pretrial detention until June 2022, when they were sentenced to nine and five years in prison, respectively.

The work of independent media and journalists was further impeded by the passage of the amended penal code in May 2022, which criminalizes the receipt of funds used to promote acts that the government considers contrary to state security. Several rights organizations, including the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), condemned the legislation as part of an "intricate and perverse legal regime of censorship" by the government intended to further suppress the country's independent media. Numerous independent journalists were coerced into publicly resigning in exchange for their freedom during the year, and many entered into exile as a result of government repression.

While Cubans do enjoy religious freedom, official obstacles make it difficult for churches to operate without interference. Certain church groups have struggled to obtain registration, and association with an unregistered group is a criminal offense. The Roman Catholic Church has enjoyed an expansion of its pastoral rights, including periodic access to state media and the ability to build new churches. Protestant and evangelical groups tend to face greater restrictions, though they too have experienced improved conditions in recent years.

After the historic July 11, 2021 protests and others throughout 2021 and 2022, both leaders and members of several religious groups have been interrogated, persecuted and forced into exile for supporting protesters' demands and assisting the families of those imprisoned for participating in the protests. In September 2022, David Pantaleón, the head of the Jesuit order in Cuba, who openly offered support for MSI activists and denounced state repression, was forced to leave the country after the authorities declined to renew his residence permit.

Academic freedom is restricted in Cuba. Private schools and universities have been banned since the early 1960s, teaching materials often contain ideological content, and educators commonly require PCC affiliation for career advancement. Despite the elimination of exit visas in 2013, university faculty must still obtain permission to travel to academic conferences abroad, and officials often prevent dissident intellectuals from attending such events. Officials also deny entry to prominent intellectuals who have been critical of the regime. Recent years have featured numerous cases of academics and students being dismissed from universities in reprisal for their political opinions or activities.

Cubans often engage in private discussions regarding everyday issues like the economy, food prices, foreign travel, and internet access, but tend to avoid discussing more sensitive political issues. Neighborhood-level "Committees for the Defense of the Revolution" assist security agencies by monitoring, reporting, and suppressing dissent.

The new penal code adopted in December 2022 designates the use of social media to incite crimes or spread disinformation—as defined by the government—as an "aggravating circumstance," allowing for higher penalties to be applied in such cases. International human rights groups have condemned the new penal code as severely limiting individuals' right to freedom of expression.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Restrictions on freedom of assembly remain a key form of political control. Security forces and government-backed assailants routinely interrupt peaceful gatherings or protests by political dissidents and civic activists.

On July 11, 2021, Cubans participated in the largest rallies in over 20 years, holding nationwide protests over shortages of basic goods, economic difficulties, the government's COVID-19 response, and a lack of fundamental freedoms. Authorities acted violently in order to disperse the protests; security officers used live ammunition, tear gas, and pepper spray, and were also seen charging protesters. One person was killed and as many as 1,300 people were arrested. During 2022, hundreds of people were sentenced on charges related to their participation in the 2021 protests, with hundreds more remaining in pretrial detention at year's end.

Antigovernment demonstrations, including protests over frequent power cuts and food shortages, continued during 2022, though not to the scale seen in 2021. Police arrested a number of protesters, and frequently used violence to disperse protests; in one case in August, while attempting to dispel an antigovernment protest in Nuevitas, police forces physically assaulted protesters, including an 11-year-old girl. In April, Carlos Ernesto Díaz González—known as Ktivo Disidente—was arrested for peacefully protesting in Havana. He was accused of contempt and defamation, put on trial in November, and found guilty and sentenced to two and a half years in jail.

Citing the 1985 Law on Associations, the government refuses to register any new organization that is not state supervised. Nearly all politically motivated short-term detentions in recent years have targeted members of independent associations, think tanks, human rights groups, political parties, and trade unions.

In 2022, state repression of activist movements and human rights organizations that had supported the protests of 2021 and 2022 severely limited their ability to engage in their work, with members facing arrest, detention, and exile. In addition to the MSI, the authorities also targeted activist groups including 27N, Archipiélago, the Ladies in White, and the Patriotic Union of Cuba (UNPACU). During the year, Berta Soler Fernández, leader of the Ladies in White, and Guillermo Fariñas, head of the United Anti-Totalitarian Forum (FANTU), were subject to repeated arrests.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Cuban workers do not have the right to strike or bargain collectively, and independent labor unions are illegal.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

According to the constitution, the National Assembly controls judicial appointments and suspensions, and the Council of State exercises these powers when the assembly is not in session. The Council of State is also empowered to issue "instructions of a general character" to the courts, whose rulings typically conform to the interests of the PCC.

In May 2022, the independent Cuban press published a video from 2018 of a meeting between the president of the Supreme Court, Rubén Remigio Ferro, and various individuals, including prosecutors and officials from the Ministry of the Interior. In the video, Remigio expressly recognized that the judiciary is controlled by the PCC and that, in practice, judges are required to issue rulings in line with PCC policies.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

The regime's systematic violation of due process is regularly illustrated by trumped-up criminal cases against dissidents and independent journalists. Cubans facing trial do not benefit from speedy proceedings.

Those arrested on July 11, 2021 faced due process violations, and the judiciary held summary trials against defendants. Courts issued convictions and sentences against 40 people by early August, though none of those individuals benefited from legal representation. Another round of trials reportedly took place in December, with the US State Department noting that over 150 defendants received prison sentences during those proceedings; some defendants convicted in December received terms of up to 30 years. Summary trials and sentencing of protesters continued in 2022.

Although violent crime rates are believed to be relatively low, physical security for the population is undermined by government-backed violence. Opposition activists, human rights defenders, and other perceived enemies of the regime are routinely subjected to public assaults, excessive use of force by police during raids and arrests, and abuse in custody. The government has repeatedly refused to allow international monitoring of its prisons. Prison conditions are poor, featuring overcrowding, forced labor, inadequate sanitation and medical care, and physical abuse.

Following the surge in popular protests seen in 2021 and 2022, explicit violence against demonstrators at the hands of the authorities has reportedly increased in frequency. In July 2021, security forces used live ammunition against protesters and subsequently engaged in violent and degrading treatment—including torture, sleep deprivation, and threats of reprisal—against those taken into custody. In 2022, security forces continued to violently repress protests and perceived dissidents across the country, with many individuals subjected to physical assaults and arbitrary arrests.

Article 42 of the 2019 constitution extended protection from discrimination to a wider array of vulnerable groups, explicitly adding categories such as ethnic origin, gender identity, sexual orientation, age, and disability to the existing safeguards regarding race, sex, national origin, and religion. PCC control of the government and justice system limits the ability to enforce such guarantees impartially or effectively, and independent calls for equal treatment can draw state reprisals.

Women enjoy legal equality and are well represented in most professions, though their labor force participation rate lags well behind that of men, suggesting persistent economic disparities and cultural double standards.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation was criminalized in the new penal code passed in May 2022. Also, in a national referendum in September, a new family code that recognizes same-sex marriage and the right of same-sex couples to adopt or be beneficiaries of assisted reproduction techniques was approved with 67 percent of the vote. Mariela Castro Espín, Raúl Castro's daughter and director of the National Center for Sex Education (CENESEX)—which seeks to control and direct LGBT+ advocacy—has advocated on behalf of LGBT+ people. However, the advocacy efforts of independent LGBT+ groups and activists are either ignored or suppressed.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement and the right to change one's residence and place of employment are restricted. Cubans still face extremely high passport fees, and Cuban doctors, diplomats, and athletes who "defect" abroad are prohibited from visiting for eight years. Numerous dissidents, including MSI member Anamely Ramos and civil rights activist Omara Ruiz Urquiola, as well as journalist and writer Carlos Manuel Álvarez, were prevented from entering Cuba in 2022.

Some dissidents and journalists are barred from foreign travel, despite a 2013 migration law that rescinded the exit-visa requirement. The number of people leaving Cuba—including those barred from traveling abroad, known as regulados—has risen sharply since the July 2021 protests, with estimates exceeding 140,000 Cuban immigrants and asylum seekers attempting to enter the United States between October 2021 and July 2022 alone.

The 2019 constitution recognized private property as one form of ownership, though opportunities to obtain property and operate private enterprises remain restricted. In June 2021, the government announced that it would allow the formation of small and medium-sized enterprises but would limit their activities to sectors that are not deemed strategic. Restrictions on self-employed workers remained under the government's updated private-enterprise policy, however. The government has at times used legal provisions, such as Decree Law 370 and Decree Law 149, to confiscate assets from individuals, organizations, and businesses as a means of repressing dissent.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individuals enjoy broad freedom in their interpersonal, romantic, and sexual relationships. While divorce is common, men and women have equal rights to marital goods and child custody. A new family code was adopted in September 2022 after being approved with 67 percent of the vote in a referendum; the new law recognizes same-sex marriage and grants same-sex couples the right to adopt or be beneficiaries of assisted reproduction techniques.

Abortion is legal in Cuba.

Domestic violence is a problem, and police are reportedly unresponsive to complaints of such abuse. In 2022, the new family code codified penalties for those convicted of domestic violence-related offenses. Other legislation passed since October 2021, including the new penal code passed in May 2022, established a number of preventative and compensatory mechanisms for victims of domestic and gender-based violence, including provisions that increase the penalties for crimes with gender-based violence as a component.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Average official salaries remain extremely low and the country faces extremely high inflation. Cubans employed by foreign firms are often much better remunerated than their fellow citizens, even though most are contracted through a state employment agency that siphons off the bulk of their wages and uses political criteria in screening applicants.

Cyprus

Population: 1,300,000
Capital: Nicosia
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed here do not reflect conditions in Northern Cyprus, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed or occupied territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology.

Overview: The Republic of Cyprus is a democracy with de jure sovereignty over the entire island. In practice, however, the government controls only the southern, largely Greek-speaking part of the island, as the northern area is ruled by the self-declared Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC), recognized only by Turkey. Political rights and civil liberties are generally respected in the Republic of Cyprus. Ongoing concerns include corruption, societal discrimination against minority groups, obstacles to integration for migrants, and weaknesses in the asylum system.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Political affairs during the year were focused on the upcoming February 2023 presidential election, with different parties declaring support for their respective candidates and policy proposals.
- The country's capacity to process and host migrants and asylum seekers came under further strain, as new asylum applications increased by more than 60 percent compared with 2021.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who serves as both head of state and head of government, is elected by popular vote for up to two five-year terms. President Nicos Anastasiades of the center-right Democratic Rally (DISY) party won a second term with 56 percent of the vote in a 2018 runoff against Stavros Malas, who was backed by the left-wing Progressive Party of Working People (AKEL). The two had outpolled seven other candidates in the first round. International observers found that the overall election process adhered to democratic principles.

The next presidential election was set for February 2023, and Anastasiades said he would not seek a third term, quieting a debate on whether a 2019 constitutional amendment imposing the two-term limit should apply retroactively.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The unicameral House of Representatives has 80 seats filled through proportional representation in six multimember electoral districts. Members serve five-year terms. In practice, only 56 seats are occupied, as the 24 seats reserved for the Turkish Cypriot community have been left unfilled since Turkish Cypriot representatives withdrew from the chamber in 1964.

In the 2021 legislative elections, which were held in accordance with international standards, DISY led the voting with 17 seats, down one from 2016, followed by AKEL with 15, also a one-seat decline. The centrist Democratic Party (DIKO) received nine seats, the far-right National Popular Front (ELAM) received four, the Movement for Social Democracy–Citizens' Alliance (EDEK-SYPOL) also took four seats, and the Green Party (KOSP) secured three seats. The liberal centrist Democratic Alignment (DIPA) won parliamentary representation for the first time, receiving four seats.

Also in 2021, the parliament voted to postpone that year's municipal elections until the 2024 implementation of structural reforms that would, among other changes, reduce the number of municipalities. The incumbent municipal councils would remain in place while the reforms were pending.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair. Voters may only cast ballots at their locality of residence, not in other parts of Cyprus, and from abroad under certain conditions. In its report on the 2021 legislative elections, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) praised the electoral administration but recommended several improvements, including legal provisions for the presence of foreign and citizen observers, caps on parties' campaign spending, and earlier reporting requirements for such spending.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

A wide array of parties compete in the political system. Cyprus's two main parties, DISY on the right and AKEL on the left, usually split the largest share of the vote, but other parties are often able to play significant roles. In the most recent elections, the vote threshold for parties to win representation in the legislature was 3.6 percent.

Cyprus has experienced regular democratic transfers of power between rival parties in recent decades. Multiple opposition parties are able to gain representation in the legislature.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People are generally able to express their political choices without undue interference from outside actors.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Three recognized Christian minority groups—the Armenians, the Latins (Catholic), and the Maronites—each have one nonvoting representative in the parliament. Members of these communities vote in special elections for their representatives, as well as in the general elections. The 24 seats reserved for the Turkish Cypriot population remain unfilled. However, in the 2019 European Parliament (EP) elections, AKEL's Niyazi Kızılyürek became the first Turkish Cypriot to be elected to the EP or to win office in the Republic of Cyprus since 1964.

Women in Cyprus have equal political rights, but sexism and patriarchal attitudes discourage them from playing a more active role in politics. No parliamentary party is led by a woman, and parties have failed to meet internal quotas mandating that 30 to 35 percent of their candidates be women. Only eight women were elected to the parliament in 2021, a decline from the 2016 results. Nevertheless, that year Annita Demetriou of DISY became the first woman to be elected as speaker of the Cypriot parliament.

The interests of the LGBT+ community, which still faces significant discrimination from some sectors of society, are not always well represented in the political system.

Immigrants have some access to naturalization procedures and the political rights associated with citizenship, generally requiring several years of legal residency to apply. Separately, many Cyprus-born residents with one Turkish and one Turkish Cypriot parent have faced lengthy delays in their citizenship applications, leaving them stateless in some cases.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected government is able to make and implement policy without improper interference from unelected entities.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Cyprus has strong anticorruption laws that are, for the most part, adequately enforced. However, there have been a number of high-profile corruption scandals in recent years, and the government has faced criticism for early releases and pardons of individuals convicted on corruption charges.

In 2022, the authorities continued to revoke passports that had been granted illegally under a flawed citizenship-by-investment program. The program was terminated in 2020 following revelations that passports had been improperly issued to individuals with criminal records or links to foreign governments.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

In general, the government operates with openness and transparency. A freedom of information law was enacted in 2017, though civil society activists argued that its exemptions were too broad.

Most candidates for the February 2023 presidential election agreed during 2022 to comply with an enhanced asset-declaration procedure proposed by independent experts who regarded the legally required declarations as inadequate.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 54 / 60 (−1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of speech is constitutionally guaranteed, and media freedom is generally respected. A vibrant independent press frequently holds the authorities to account. Numerous private outlets compete with public media. There are no restrictions on access to online news sources.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and generally protected in practice. Nearly 90 percent of those living in government-controlled Cyprus are Orthodox Christians, and the Orthodox Church enjoys certain privileges, including religious instruction and some religious services in public schools. Non-Orthodox students may opt out of such activities. The government also constitutionally recognizes and subsidizes non-Orthodox Christian and Muslim religious institutions, and it facilitates crossings to and from Northern Cyprus for the purpose of worship at religious sites. Unrecognized religious groups can receive tax exemptions by registering as nonprofit organizations.

Muslim groups have occasionally faced obstacles in the operation of their religious sites or discrimination by the general public. Muslims have criticized the hours of access to Hala Sultan Tekke, an important holy site in Larnaca that is administered by the Department of Antiquities. The site's mosque is generally open for only two of Islam's five daily prayers for most of the year, though extended hours are granted during Ramadan and at other times upon request.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is respected in Cyprus. However, state schools use textbooks containing negative language about Turkish Cypriots and Turkey, and there is pressure from elements of the political system regarding schools' treatment of sensitive historical and unification-related issues.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to engage in political and other sensitive discussions without fear of retribution or surveillance.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

NGOs are generally free to operate without government interference. However, the government has used regulatory rules to harass specific organizations in recent years. A 2020 amendment to the law on associations empowered the Interior Ministry to swiftly deregister NGOs that it deems inactive or noncompliant with the law's filing requirements. The ministry then deregistered Action for Equality, Support, Antiracism (KISA), which was known for its advocacy on behalf of migrants and asylum seekers, on the grounds that it failed to file documents with the Registrar of Associations within the required deadline. The necessary information was submitted after the deadline, but in 2021 the ministry ordered banks to freeze the organization's assets, and the Administrative Court rejected KISA's appeal of the deregistration. An appeal to the Supreme Court was still pending at the end of 2022. Also during the year, several NGOs had their bank accounts temporarily frozen under indiscriminate policies related to addresses in Northern Cyprus or protections against money laundering.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to strike, form independent trade unions, and engage in collective bargaining. The law provides remedies for antiunion discrimination, though enforcement is uneven.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent. Supreme Court judges are appointed by the president on the recommendation of the court's existing members, and lower court judges are appointed by Supreme Court judges in their capacity as the Supreme Council of Judicature.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The justice system generally upholds due process standards. Law enforcement agencies largely observe safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, and criminal defendants have access to counsel and fair trial procedures.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

Residents are free from major threats to physical security, though human rights monitors have noted cases of police brutality. Overcrowding and other problematic conditions have been reported at prisons and migrant detention centers.

Despite government efforts to combat prejudice and inequality, members of non–Greek Cypriot minority groups, including migrants and asylum seekers, face discrimination and occasional violence.

A total of 21,565 new asylum applications were filed in Cyprus during 2022, a 63 percent increase from the 2021 total. Partly as a result of this rise, there were some 30,000 asylum applications pending at the end of 2022, up from nearly 19,000 at the end of 2021. A specialized administrative court began operating in 2019 to handle appeals. In 2021, the government simplified procedures for hiring asylum seekers, though they were permitted to work only in certain sectors and categories of employment. Most asylum seekers arrive by land through the TRNC, prompting allegations from the Cypriot government that Ankara is encouraging irregular migration. Cypriot authorities have engaged in controversial maritime pushbacks to Lebanon to prevent arrivals by sea.

Overcrowding and other poor conditions at the Pournara reception center have been exacerbated by the rise in new arrivals, prompting periodic protests by the residents. The center, built in 2014 as an emergency reception facility for up to 400 people, was later expanded to accommodate 1,000. By 2022 it reportedly hosted more than 2,000 people, with authorities struggling to properly house unaccompanied minors and other vulnerable groups.

Gender discrimination in the workplace remains a problem, including with respect to hiring practices, salaries, and sexual harassment; laws against such discrimination have not been adequately enforced.

Antidiscrimination laws generally prohibit bias based on sexual orientation, and there are legal protections for transgender people on some issues. However, the LGBT+ community continues to face societal discrimination in practice.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16 (−1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

There are few impediments to freedom of movement within the government-controlled area. The UN buffer zone dividing the island remains in place, but the number of border crossings between north and south has increased over the last decade.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4 (−1)

Property rights are generally respected in Cyprus.

A 1991 law stipulates that property left by Turkish Cypriots after 1974, when a Turkish invasion divided the island, is administered by the Interior Ministry. Under the law in the north, Greek Cypriots can appeal to the Immovable Property Commission (IPC), which has been recognized by the European Court of Human Rights as a responsible authority for the resolution of property disputes. However, its work has been seriously impaired in recent years by a lack of funding from the TRNC and Ankara.

In September 2022, the government confirmed that many Turkish Cypriot properties had been illegally sublet by Greek Cypriots who exploited the low rents charged by the Interior Ministry's management agency. Meanwhile, Turkish Cypriot owners continued to be denied access and restitution.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because Turkish Cypriot property managed by the Interior Ministry has been regularly subjected to illegal subletting by Greek Cypriot residents.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Personal social freedoms are largely unrestricted. Same-sex civil unions are allowed under a 2015 law. However, there are no adoption rights for same-sex couples. No progress was reported during 2022 on legislation proposed in 2017 to allow corrections of one's legal gender. Domestic violence remains a problem despite official efforts to prevent and punish it. Government-funded shelters are open to survivors of domestic abuse.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The legal framework generally protects workers against exploitative conditions of employment, and the government has made genuine progress in combating human trafficking. However, persistent problems include insufficient resources for labor inspectors and illegally low pay for undocumented migrant workers. Migrant workers and asylum seekers remain vulnerable to sexual exploitation and forced labor.

Czech Republic

Population: 10,500,000
Capital: Prague
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Czech Republic is a parliamentary democracy in which political rights and civil liberties are generally respected. In recent years, the country has experienced several corruption scandals and political disputes that have hampered normal legislative activity, though institutions are responsive to corruption allegations. Illiberal rhetoric and the influence of powerful business entities in the political arena are visible.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In November, a bill meant to strengthen the independence of Czech Television (ČT) and Czech Radio (ČRo) passed its first reading. The bill, which was then sent to a parliamentary committee, would make it more difficult to remove their board members and allow the Senate to fill some of their boards' seats.
- In March, former prime minister Andrej Babiš was indicted over accusations that a Agrofert, firm he maintained effective ownership of, improperly benefited from European Union (EU) subsidies. The trial against Babiš and an associate began in September and was ongoing at year's end.
- In June, prosecutors charged 11 people with bribery and other offenses related to alleged misconduct at the Prague Transport Company, including lobbyist and businessman Michal Redl. The education minister resigned over his connection to Redl in June, while intelligence chief resigned in August.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 36 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is the head of state but holds limited powers and is directly elected to up to two five-year terms. In January 2018, incumbent Miloš Zeman of the Party of Civic Rights was reelected, defeating Jiří Drahoš in the second round.

The prime minister is the head of government and holds most executive power. Petr Fiala of the Civic Democratic Party (ODS) became prime minister in November 2021, a month after parliamentary elections. Fiala leads a coalition government comprising two pro-EU electoral alliances; one is the Together coalition (SPOLU), while the other includes the Czech Pirate Party and centrist Mayors and Independents.

The 200 members of the Chamber of Deputies, the lower house of Parliament, are elected to four-year terms by proportional representation. The Senate, the upper chamber, which holds limited legislative power, has 81 members elected for six-year terms, with one-third up for election every two years.

The free and fair October 2021 elections saw a voter turnout of 65.4 percent. The Action of Dissatisfied Citizens (ANO) party won a plurality of 72 seats in the Chamber of Deputies. SPOLU—comprising the ODS, the Christian Democratic Union–Czechoslovak People's Party (KDU-ČSL), and Tradition, Responsibility, Prosperity 09 (TOP 09)—won 71. The Pirates-Mayors coalition took 37. The populist, anti-immigration Freedom and Direct Democracy (SPD) party won 20. SPOLU and the Pirates-Mayors group formed a governing coalition, with then premier Babiš giving way that November.

The ANO performed well in local elections held in September 2022. However, it won few of the Senate seats contested in two rounds in September and October. The ANO won 3 of the Senate seats decided in October, while SPOLU won 20.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The electoral framework is robust and generally well implemented by the State Election Commission. However, the body does not always operate with transparency. In 2021, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe expressed disappointment that most of its previous recommendations went unaddressed.

The Interior Ministry was responsible for registering candidates for the January 2023 presidential election. In December 2022, the Supreme Administrative Court ruled that businessman Karel Diviš was inappropriately excluded and could run. It also disqualified activist Denisa Rohanová; some of her backers were lower-house members whose mandates had ended before the election was due.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

Political parties are free to form and operate.

Presidential candidates can qualify after receiving 50,000 signatures or otherwise securing the support of 20 deputies or 10 senators. However, the law is unclear as to whether a candidacy submitted by outgoing lawmakers is permitted.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Power rotates between parties regularly. The liberal Pirates-Mayors coalition and the center-right SPOLU were both formed ahead of the October 2021 polls.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The influence of politically connected media outlets has been a notable concern. In recent years, critics have accused Babiš of using MF Dnes and Lidove noviny, newspapers he placed in a trust during his premiership, to advance his political and business interests.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

By law, all citizens have full political rights and electoral opportunities. However, Roma lack meaningful political representation.

Women are underrepresented in electoral politics and appointed positions. Women held 52 lower-house seats as of December 2022, a record. Women held 15 Senate seats as of September.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are duly installed and generally able to craft and implement policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a problem in Czech politics, but institutions have generally been responsive to corruption allegations.

In 2017, Czech police and the European Anti-Fraud Office (OLAF) began investigating Babiš following allegations of improprieties regarding the disbursement of EU subsidies to Agrofert, a company Babiš maintained de facto ownership of. In 2018, OLAF concluded that the subsidies were obtained in a manner that may have broken Czech law. Babiš was indicted in March 2022 and the trial against him and an associate began in September. Babiš, who was considering contesting the 2023 presidential election, argued that the case was politically motivated. The trial was ongoing at year's end.

The coalition government was affected by allegations of misconduct at the Prague Transport Company in 2022. In June, prosecutors charged 11 people with bribery and other offenses, including Prague deputy mayor Petr Hlubuček, who resigned from his post. Lobbyist and businessman Michal Redl was also charged. Education Minister Petr Gazdík, who met Redl several times, resigned that same month, while Civil Intelligence Service chief Petr Mlejnek, who was also linked to Redl, left his post in August.

In November 2022, the government presented a new bill to protect whistleblowers. The bill faced criticism for potentially burdening larger companies while offering insufficient protections for whistleblowers. The measure was making its way through Parliament at year's end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government often fails to proactively publish information about procurement processes, public officials' salaries, and public spending. Members of the public must request a time-sensitive password to view asset declarations online. Under a 2018 law, the "ultimate beneficial owners" of companies and trust funds must be disclosed in a register. That register is not available to the public, though law enforcement agencies, the courts, and several other entities can access it.

In August 2022, an amended version of the 1999 Act on Free Access to Information took effect, requiring more partially state-owned firms to abide by its provisions. The law also expands the provision of information regarding public-sector compensation.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16 (+1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4 (+1)

The media operate relatively freely, and the government does not place undue restrictions on content.

Legislation protects private ownership of media outlets, but concerns remain about the extent to which the media is controlled by wealthy business figures. Critics had accused Babiš's newspapers of providing biased coverage and acting as tools to advance his political interests, though government pressure on the media sector has declined since he left office.

The independence of publicly owned ČT was threatened under the Babiš-led ANO government, which unsuccessfully attempted to appoint new members to ČT's board and unseat its director. In November 2022, a bill meant to strengthen the independence of ČT and ČRo passed its first reading. The bill, which was then sent to a parliamentary committee, would make it more difficult to remove ČT and ČRo board members and would empower the Senate to fill some of their boards' seats.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because government pressure on and influence over the media has decreased since Andrej Babiš, a media magnate who retained control over several private outlets, left the premiership in late 2021.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The government generally upholds freedom of religion. Tax benefits and financial support are provided to registered religious groups. In 2012, the government passed a law to facilitate the return of land confiscated from churches by the former communist regime. In 2019, the Constitutional Court ruled that churches cannot be taxed for returned land.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected. Ceremonial presidential approval is required for academic positions.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally able to express controversial or political opinions without fear of surveillance or retribution.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is upheld in practice, and demonstrations take place frequently and without incident.

Protests took place peacefully and without undue interference from the authorities during 2022. Large antigovernment protests were held in Prague in September and late October, while a large progovernment rally was held at the end of October.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Tens of thousands of registered nongovernmental organizations operate in the country, generally without official interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions and professional associations function freely, though they are weak in practice. Workers have the right to strike, though this right is limited for essential public employees, such as hospital workers and air traffic controllers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary is largely independent, though its complexity and multilayered composition have led to slow delivery of judgments.

In March 2022, President Zeman pardoned an associate who received a three-year prison sentence for manipulating a public tender process. The president of the Constitutional Court and the head of the Union of Public Prosecutors criticized Zeman's pardon.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The rule of law generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. Despite corruption and political pressure within law enforcement agencies, the office of the public prosecutor has become more independent in recent years.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

The Czech Republic is free from war and insurgencies. However, prisons are overcrowded and at times unsanitary.

In June 2021, police intervened in a fight involving Stanislav Tomáš, a Romany man, pinning him to the ground while kneeling on his back; Tomáš later died in an ambulance. A wave of protests followed Tomáš's death, prompting calls for an investigation into police brutality against Roma people. In March 2022, the General Inspectorate of Security Forces ruled that police acted lawfully when interacting with Tomáš and found no causal link between their actions and his death.

The 2009 Antidiscrimination Act provides for equal treatment regardless of sex, race, age, disability, belief, or sexual orientation. Roma face discrimination in the job market and significantly poorer housing conditions than non-Roma, as well as occasional threats and violence from right-wing groups. Many Roma children attend ethnically segregated schools.

Women are underrepresented at the highest levels of business and suffer a large pay gap.

Anti-Muslim attitudes have increased in recent years amid a legal battle between Prague and the EU over refugee quotas. The SPD has used Islamophobic rhetoric, characterizing Islam as "incompatible with freedom and democracy." These positions are episodically approved by some of the highest representatives of state.

Asylum seekers are routinely detained, and conditions in detention centers are generally poor. The country has been relatively welcoming to Ukrainians, however; 454,000 received temporary protection as of the end of October 2022 according to the United Nations.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education. Coronavirus-related movement restrictions were lifted in early 2022.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The rights to own property and operate private businesses are established in the law and upheld in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Authorities generally do not restrict social freedoms. Same-sex marriages are not legally recognized, though same-sex partners can enter civil unions. While gender discrimination is legally prohibited, sexual harassment in the workplace appears to be fairly common.

In June 2022, a group of lawmakers proposed a civil-code amendment that would allow same-sex marriages. Another group of lawmakers proposed a constitutional amendment to define marriage as a union between a man and a woman in July. Parliament did not complete the legislative process for either proposal by year's end.

Parliament has not ratified the Council of Europe's Istanbul Convention on preventing and combating violence against women, though the government signed the treaty in 2016. In January 2022, Justice Minister Pavel Blažek requested a one-year postponement on the ratification debate. Reports show that only a small number of perpetrators of gender-based violence face criminal charges.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Human trafficking remains a problem as organized criminal groups use the country as a source, transit, and destination point; women and children are particularly vulnerable to being trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation. The government has made serious efforts to fund protective services and other resources for survivors and to prosecute perpetrators.

Denmark

Population: 5,900,000
Capital: Copenhagen
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Denmark is a robust democracy with regular free and fair elections. Citizens enjoy full political rights, the government protects free expression and association, and the judiciary functions independently. However, Denmark has struggled to uphold fundamental freedoms for immigrants and other newcomers.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, a commission of inquiry found that Prime Minister Mette Frederiksen had acted without sufficient legal basis in requiring Danish mink farms to cull their herds in late 2020 due to a COVID-19 strain spreading in the mink population. In July, Parliament officially reprimanded Frederiksen over the issue.
- In March, Parliament adopted a special law for Ukraine, giving protection to people fleeing the Russian government's full-scale invasion of that country. By the end of the year, 32,800 Ukrainians had been issued temporary residence permits.
- In December, Frederiksen announced the formation of a left-right coalition government following snap elections held in November amid continued fallout over the 2020 mink culling. Frederiksen, whose Social Democratic Party (SDP) took a plurality of votes, remained prime minister.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The constitution retains a monarch, currently Queen Margrethe II, with mostly ceremonial duties. The monarch chooses the prime minister, usually the leader of the largest party or government coalition. Mette Frederiksen of the SDP was appointed by Queen Margrethe in June 2019, after that party emerged as Parliament's largest in the election held that month. Frederiksen was reappointed prime minister in December 2022 after the November parliamentary elections.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 179 members of Denmark's unicameral Parliament (Folketinget) are elected to four-year terms through a system of modified proportional representation.

Frederiksen—who had headed an SDP-led government since 2019 with the support of the Red-Green Alliance, the Socialist People's Party (SF), and the Social Liberal Party (SLP)—called for early elections in November 2022 amid ongoing fallout from the government's November 2020 decision to order the culling of the Danish mink population due to the spread of COVID-19. Frederiksen's center-left bloc won a one-seat majority in the snap parliamentary elections, but she resigned as prime minister the day after the election, announcing that she would work to form a left-right coalition government. In December, her efforts yielded a government comprising the SDP, the Liberal Party, and the newly formed Moderate party. The election was considered competitive and democratic by international monitors, and the results were accepted by stakeholders and the public.

Local elections held in November 2021 were competitive and well-administered.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Robust electoral laws are upheld impartially by the various bodies tasked with implementation.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Numerous political parties compete freely. Fourteen competed in the November 2022 national elections, the second-highest number ever. The Moderate party, one of the three members of the new ruling coalition, was newly formed by former prime minister Lars Løkke Rasmussen in June 2022.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The Danish political system is open to the rise of opposition parties through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and political figures are generally free from undue influences by actors who are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

The electoral laws guarantee universal suffrage for citizens, as well as representation in regional and municipal elections for permanent residents. Refugees and other immigrants may vote in municipal and regional but not general elections, after having obtained permanent residence at least three years before an election date. Women, LGBT+ people, people with disabilities, and members of ethnic and religious minority groups are represented in prominent positions.

The territories of Greenland and the Faroe Islands each have two representatives in Parliament. They also have their own elected institutions, which have power over almost all areas of governance, except foreign and financial policy.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Denmark's freely elected government is able to craft and implement policy. Governments most often control a minority of seats in Parliament, ruling with the aid of one or more supporting parties. Since 1909, no single party has held a majority of seats.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Anticorruption laws and bodies are generally effective, and corruption is not considered an urgent problem in Denmark. The government upholds a zero-tolerance policy for corruption and is subject to independent audits; those found in violation of anticorruption regulations face criminal prosecution.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Government operations are generally transparent. The Public Access to Information Act recognizes the right to request government information, though with some exceptions, such as information concerning national security and foreign policy.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Domestic media reflect a wide variety of political opinions and are frequently critical of the government.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of worship is legally protected. However, the Evangelical Lutheran Church is subsidized by the government as the official state religion. The faith is taught in public schools, though students may withdraw from religious classes with parental consent.

In 2018, a general ban on the public wearing of face coverings, widely referred to as a "burqa ban" applicable to Muslim women, took effect. Between 2018 and 2020, an average of 20 people a year were charged with violating the ban. In 2021, only two charges were filed under the law, and in 2022, only one. Fines for defying the ban range from $150 to $300.

In 2018, Parliament adopted a law requiring mandatory participation in a ceremony for confirmation of newly granted Danish citizenship, with guidelines including a requirement for shaking hands. The provision was viewed as a means of requiring Muslims who refuse to touch someone of a different gender on religious grounds to adopt practices seen as "Danish." In February 2022, one person was denied citizenship for protesting the law by refusing to shake hands during the citizenship ceremony. The handshake rule had been suspended as part of Denmark's COVID-19 preventative protocols, but was reinstated in January 2022.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is vibrant and unrestricted.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly, which is upheld in practice. Restrictions were placed on assembly throughout 2020 and 2021 to limit the spread of COVID-19, but all were lifted in January 2022.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely in Denmark, and frequently inform policy debates.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers are free to organize and bargain collectively.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent. Judges are formally appointed by the monarch but are recommended by the Justice Minister in consultation with the independent Judicial Appointments Council.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Citizens enjoy full due-process rights. However, restrictions imposed especially on rejected asylum seekers remain in force. Individuals who were denied asylum in Denmark, but whom the government is for various reasons unable to deport, may be subject to administrative measures parallel to those imposed on people with criminal convictions. Many such individuals live in isolated centers with poor facilities where they are subject to travel restrictions and have no legal option to challenge their placement.

In October 2019, Parliament adopted legislation that would allow the minister of immigration and integration to strip citizenship from individuals who fight abroad for extremist groups, namely the Islamic State (IS); the minister only has the power to do so for those holding dual citizenship. Further, children born to Danish parents in conflict zones are no longer granted Danish citizenship at birth, and the Danish foreign service may deny fighters in foreign conflicts consular assistance. As of April 2022, 12 people considered to be "foreign fighters" had been stripped of their Danish citizenship. Seven of these have appealed the government's decision; court proceedings in one such case ended in October when the Supreme Court confirmed an April High Court ruling that the decision to revoke citizenship was legal.

People in Denmark are generally free from violent crime and physical abuse by state authorities.

Discrimination, including based on gender identity or sexual orientation, is prohibited by law.

In November 2021 and March 2022 respectively, Parliament adopted special laws regarding refugees evacuated from Afghanistan and Ukraine. As of the end of 2022, almost 900 Afghan and approximately 32,800 Ukrainian refugees were granted residency permits. The permits for both groups expire after two years—with Ukrainians given the option of a one-year extension—after which refugees must apply for asylum or for a different type of residency.

In recent years, controversy has arisen over the disproportionate number of people with non-Danish ethnic ancestry in the justice system. In March 2022, the Danish Institute of Human Rights (DIHR) released a report indicating that immigrants are more likely to be falsely accused of a crime than ethnic Danish people. The report cites data showing that first- and second-generation immigrants are 27 percent and 45 percent more likely, respectively, to be charged with a crime that ends in dropped charges or an acquittal than are ethnic Danish people.

In October 2021, 14 out of 19 children with a claim to Danish citizenship who had been living at the Syrian al-Hol and al-Roj prison camps arrived back in Denmark with their mothers. The Danish government offered to retrieve the remaining five children but not their mothers, whom the government accused of association with the IS, but the offer was rejected by the mothers. The organization Repatriate the Children raised the issue in the Danish city courts in May 2022, suing the government on behalf of three of the children and two of the mothers. The trial concluded in December 2022 with a ruling in favor of the Danish state.

In February 2022, the admissibility of a case, Johansen v. Denmark, was arbitrated at the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR). The case, which concerned the deprivation of a dual citizen's Danish citizenship following a conviction on terrorism charges, was deemed inadmissible due to the complaint being "manifestly ill-founded." The court highlighted "that it was legitimate for Contracting States to take a firm stand against terrorism, which in itself constituted a grave threat to human rights."

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is protected by law and generally respected by the government. However, in 2018, the government, then headed by Lars Løkke Rasmussen, proposed an "antighetto" initiative, applicable to neighborhoods identified as having high unemployment and crime rates as well as a high percentage of residents designated to have "non-Western" origins. In June 2021, Parliament made changes to the regulations, expanding their reach to new neighborhoods. The revision, which replaces the term "ghetto" with "parallel society," imposes tenancy restrictions based on education, income, ethnicity, and criminal record. In November 2022, the Danish Eastern High Court referred a case brought on behalf of a group of Danish residents affected by the initiatives to the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU). The court will rule on whether the "antighetto" policies—particularly the tenancy quotas based on "non-Western" background—violate the European Union (EU) Race Equality Directive.

Since 2015, Denmark has enacted measures that restrict the movement of people who seek to join, or have joined, extremist groups abroad—notably the IS. Some of the measures have been criticized for having a low evidentiary threshold or for lacking appropriate oversight mechanisms. In October 2022, the ECHR ruled that Denmark did not violate the freedom of movement of a Dutch national sentenced to six months in prison for traveling to a restricted area in Syria to join a group fighting against the IS.

Private business activity is free from undue influence by government officials or nonstate actors.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Refugees and other newcomers face lengthy waiting times for family reunification, including in cases involving small children, and restrictions on family reunification were tightened in the wake of the 2015 refugee crisis.

In 1989, Denmark became the first country in the world to adopt same-sex civil unions, and in 2012, Parliament overwhelmingly passed same-sex marriage legislation enabling couples to wed in the Lutheran state church of their choosing.

Since December 2020, sex without explicit consent has been criminalized.

In December 2021, former immigration minister Inger Støjberg was convicted of unlawfully separating several couples seeking asylum in Denmark in 2016—including couples with children and those with one partner below the age of 18—and was sentenced to two months in prison. A majority of legislators voted to remove Støjberg from Parliament later that month, but in the November 2022 elections she was voted into Parliament again after forming a new party in June.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

Public- and private-sector workers are generally free from exploitation by employers. The government and NGOs work, frequently in conjunction, to identify and prevent human trafficking and to provide aid to survivors.

Djibouti

Population: 1,100,000
Capital: Djibouti
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Djibouti is a republic ruled by a powerful president, Ismail Omar Guelleh, who has been in office since 1999 and is not subject to term limits. While Djibouti technically has a multiparty political system, the ruling Union for a Presidential Majority (UMP) uses authoritarian means to maintain its dominant position. The opposition's ability to operate is severely constrained, and journalists and activists who air criticism of Guelleh or the UMP are regularly harassed or arrested.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In March, authorities held regional and communal elections that the UMP won while facing almost no competition; the only area where other party lists competed was Ali Sabieh. Opposition parties were either limited in their activities or simply boycotted the polls, which they did not perceive as free or fair.
- Also in March, the deputy director of materials, Farah Mohamed Osman, and director of the general treasury, Sahal Said Awaleh, were arrested over an alleged money laundering operation. However, critics claim their arrest was driven by the desire to silence voices opposing the Guelleh regime, rather than as part of larger efforts to clamp down on political corruption in Djibouti.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 5 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president, who holds most executive power, serves five-year terms without term limits. President Guelleh was elected to a fifth term in April 2021 with 97 percent of the vote, according to the Interior Ministry. Of the nearly 215,000 citizens registered to vote, more than 80 percent cast ballots, according to the African Union (AU) observation mission. The AU monitors also reported that the polls were conducted competently, though the main opposition parties boycotted the contest, alleging that the election administration would be neither free nor fair.

The 65 members of the unicameral National Assembly are directly elected for five-year terms. Constitutional changes in 2010 called for the creation of an upper house, which had yet to be established as of 2022.

Most of the opposition boycotted legislative elections held in 2018, citing the government's failure to honor a 2014 political agreement that provided for electoral reform. The 2018 polls were marked by irregularities, and the ruling UMP increased its majority to 57 of 65 seats. The opposition Union for Democracy and Justice–Djiboutian Democratic Party (UDJ-PDD) won seven seats, and the Center of Unified Democrats (CDU) took one.

In March 2022, authorities held regional and communal elections that the UMP won while facing almost no competition; the only area where other lists competed was Ali Sabieh. Opposition parties were either limited in their activities or simply boycotted the polls, which they did not perceive as free or fair.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

A core element of the 2014 political agreement—meant to end the opposition's boycott of the legislature following deeply flawed elections in 2013—was a pledge to reform the Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI), which the opposition has accused of bias. These reforms had not been carried out as of 2022. Other electoral provisions favor the dominant party, for example by awarding at least 80 percent of the seats in each multimember parliamentary district to the party that wins a majority in that district.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16

While Djibouti technically has a multiparty political system, parties must register with the government to operate legally. The authorities have denied recognition to a number of opposition parties; members of such parties have been periodically harassed, arrested, and prosecuted, and their offices have been raided by police. The law requires the leaders of political parties to have clean criminal records, and the government has pursued spurious charges against opposition figures to disqualify them or their parties.

President Guelleh has been in power since 1999, when he succeeded his uncle, the only other president since independence in 1977. The 2013 elections marked the first time that the opposition had won any seats in the National Assembly. Opposition parties have traditionally been disadvantaged by Djibouti's electoral system, media controls, abuse of state resources to favor incumbents, and arrests and harassment of opposition leaders and supporters.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The ruling party dominates the state apparatus and uses security forces and other administrative resources to marginalize, disrupt, and suppress independent political activity.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The constitution prohibits political parties based on gender or on ethnic, religious, or regional identity. Minority groups, including the Afar, Yemeni Arabs, and non-Issa Somalis, are represented at all levels of the government, but the president's majority Issa group holds paramount positions in the ruling party, the civil service, and the security forces. Members of the Afar community are marginalized and in response have formed groups such as the militant FRUD-Armé, a splinter group of the Front for the Restoration and Democracy political party that has attacked government installations throughout Djibouti.

Women are underrepresented in leadership positions. A legal quota ensures that women hold at least 25 percent of the seats in the National Assembly, and the actual number is only slightly above that level. In practice, the authoritarian political system restricts the ability of women and members of ethnic and religious minorities to organize independently and advance their respective interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The president, who is not freely elected, effectively controls policymaking and governance, and the UMP-dominated parliament does not serve as a meaningful check on executive power.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is a serious problem that is enabled and sustained by the dominant position of President Guelleh and his ruling party in every aspect of public administration. All significant business deals reportedly go through the president himself.

State bodies tasked with combating corruption lack the resources and independence to function effectively. Prosecutions of senior officials are rare. When senior officials are prosecuted, cases are often pursued selective and politicized. The deputy director of materials, Farah Mohamed Osman, and head of the treasury, Sahal Said Awaleh, were arrested over an alleged money laundering operation in March 2022. However, critics claim their arrest was driven by the desire to silence voices opposing the Guelleh regime rather than as part of larger efforts to clamp down on political corruption in Djibouti.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government operates in an opaque manner and resists attempts to shed light on its policymaking, budgetary, and procurement decisions.

There is also little transparency on President Guelleh's investment deals with the Chinese government and other foreign entities, which have resulted in a massive amount of public debt and spread discontent among local communities that were not consulted on the location or terms of foreign development projects.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 19 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Despite constitutional protections, freedom of expression is not upheld in practice, and j*ournalists engage in self-censorship.* Defamation and distribution of false information are criminal offenses. The National Communication Commission distributes licenses to media outlets; the National Security Service reportedly has a role in approving such licenses. The government owns the dominant newspaper, television station, and radio broadcaster, as well as printing presses.

According to Reporters Without Borders, domestic media content generally reflects government views. Journalists affiliated with outlets based abroad or small opposition publications are subject to harassment and arbitrary arrest. The websites of overseas opposition radio station La Voix de Djibouti, run by exiles in Europe, and the Association for Respect for Human Rights in Djibouti (ARDHD) are sometimes blocked by the state-owned internet service provider.

In July 2020, police arrested journalist Charmarke Saïd Darar, a reporter working for La Voix de Djibouti, while covering protests over the detention and alleged torture of an air force pilot. Darar was held without access to a lawyer until his release nearly a month later, during which time police interrogated him, physically assaulted him, and deprived him of food and water.

Islam is the state religion, and 94 percent of the population is Sunni Muslim. The Islamic Affairs Ministry oversees religious matters. Registered non-Muslim religious groups operate freely, and unregistered groups are able to worship in private, though public proselytizing is illegal.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom is not always respected. Teachers have at times been detained for alleged affiliation with opposition groups. The state oversees the curriculums of the secular public school system and private Islamic schools.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Open discussion of sensitive political issues is impeded by restrictive laws on defamation and other such offenses. The government reportedly monitors social media and conducts surveillance on perceived opponents. Individuals are subject to arrest for posting critical content about the government online.

In March 2020, air force lieutenant Fouad Youssouf Ali fled to Ethiopia and called for an armed uprising in a video on social media in which he accused a military official of corruption and clan-based discrimination. After Ethiopian authorities deported him back to Djibouti in April, the government arrested him on charges of treason, defamation of the armed forces, and incitement to hatred and rebellion. In June, he released a video from prison, alleging he had been tortured while detained. In November 2021, Ali was referred to a criminal court, where he was convicted of attempting to incite a coup and attempted theft of military property. The court sentenced him to 10 years' imprisonment with an additional fine of 300,000 Djiboutian francs ($1,700)—he had already been fined 2 million francs ($11,254), payable to the state.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected under the constitution but not respected in practice. Permits are required for public gatherings. Police regularly use violence to disperse unauthorized protests and arrest participants. In June 2020, antigovernment protests were held for several days after the arrest and alleged torture of air force lieutenant Ali. Over 200 people were allegedly arrested.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Local human rights groups that work on politically sensitive matters cannot operate freely, face difficulties in registering with the authorities, and are subject to government harassment. Individual activists are regularly arrested for their work.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

While workers may legally join unions and strike, the union registration process is onerous and subject to government discretion, which the Labor Ministry has used to favor progovernment unions and deny registration to independent labor groups. The government has been known to intimidate labor leaders and obstruct union activities.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The courts are not independent of the government and suffer from corruption. Supreme Court judges are appointed by the president, with the advice of a judicial council dominated by presidential and UMP nominees. The president and parliamentary majority also control appointments to the Constitutional Council.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Security forces frequently make arrests without the required court approval, and lengthy pretrial detention is a problem, with detainees often waiting years to go to trial. Allegations of politically motivated prosecutions are common.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Security forces regularly engage in physical abuse and torture during arrest and detention. Prison conditions are reportedly poor, with pretrial and convicted prisoners often held together due to overcrowding. In recent years, there has been an uptick in fatal violence committed by security forces with impunity, including the killing of at least two people in 2022.

In February 2022, security forces arrested top officials within the police and the army on suspicion of plotting a coup.

In October 2022, the FRUD-Armé, an armed opposition group that has been active since 1991, attacked a military base in Garabistan, killing 7 soldiers.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Though the law provides for equal treatment of all Djiboutian citizens, Somali Issas control the ruling party and dominate government positions.

Women have fewer employment opportunities and are paid less than men for the same work. A law which requires at least 20 percent of upper-level public service positions be held by women is not enforced.

Same-sex sexual activity is not specifically banned, but such conduct has been penalized under broader morality laws, and there are no laws in place to prevent discrimination against LGBT+ people. Matters of sexual orientation and gender identity are not discussed publicly.

As of the end of 2021, Djibouti hosted roughly 34,700 refugees and asylum seekers. Slow processing of asylum claims leaves many asylum seekers at risk of deportation.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The government has been accused of suspending the travel privileges of political opponents. Civilian movement is restricted in militarized border areas due to past activity by the FRUD-Armé and tensions with Eritrea.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Private property protections are weak, and court proceedings on business and property matters are affected by corruption and political influence.

Customary practices and personal status rules based on Sharia (Islamic law) place women at a disadvantage regarding inheritance and property ownership.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Female genital mutilation (FGM) is illegal, but most women and girls have undergone the procedure. Domestic violence is rarely reported and prosecuted, and spousal rape is not specifically criminalized. The Sharia-based family code requires women to obtain a guardian's consent to marry, among other discriminatory provisions surrounding marriage and divorce.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Many residents have difficulty finding employment in the formal sector, as the president and his allies tightly control all large-scale economic activity. Legal safeguards against exploitative working conditions are poorly enforced; migrant workers and refugees are especially vulnerable to abuse.

Dominica

Population: 70,000
Capital: Roseau
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Dominica is a parliamentary democracy and has been governed by the Dominica Labor Party (DLP) since 2000. While the country is committed to democratic governance and civil liberties are generally upheld, several concerns persist; these include effective management of elections, judicial efficiency, and government corruption—notably relating to the country's Citizenship by Investment (CBI) program.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In November, Prime Minister Roosevelt Skerrit called for snap general elections. The snap elections were held in December, and saw a historically low voter turnout of just 31.6 percent; Dominica's main opposition parties, the United Workers' Party (UWP) and the Dominica Freedom Party (DFP), boycotted the elections, citing the government's failure to make progress on enacting promised electoral reforms.

- The ruling DLP controlled 19 of the 21 seats in the legislature after the December elections, including 6 seats won in November because DLP candidates had run uncontested. Independent candidates took the remaining 2 seats.
- In July, the Caribbean Court of Justice (CCJ) dismissed a case by the opposition UWP challenging the results of the 2019 general election. However, the CCJ remarked that "areas of grave concern" remained about the conduct of the elections; the DLP called the court's remarks gratuitous, and criticized the CCJ's comments for "causing unnecessary discord" in the country.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who is the ceremonial head of state, is nominated by the prime minister and opposition leader and elected by the House of Assembly for a five-year term. The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the president.

The leader of the ruling DLP, Roosevelt Skerrit, retained his position as prime minister after his party won most of the parliamentary seats in the December 2022 snap general election. Despite the poll's overall credibility, the election was marred by low voter turnout amid an opposition-led boycott over an alleged lack of progress on electoral reform.

In October 2018, the government reelected former security minister Charles Savarin as president.

Dominica's unicameral House of Assembly consists of 30 members who serve five-year terms; 21 members are directly elected, 5 senators are appointed by the prime minister, and 4 are appointed by the opposition leader. There are two ex officio members: the House speaker and the clerk of the House.

In November 2022, Prime Minister Skerrit called for snap general elections to be held that December. The DLP won 19 seats in the 2022 general elections, while independents captured 2. The elections were considered peaceful and orderly by election monitors. However, two leading opposition parties, the United Workers' Party (UWP) and the Dominica Freedom Party (DFP), along with the smaller Alternative Peoples' Party (APP), boycotted the elections, citing the government's failure to make progress on enacting electoral reforms. DLP candidates ran uncontested for six seats, resulting in those seats being allocated to the party in late November, ahead of the December elections. Both the boycott and the DLP's uncontested victories may have contributed to a historically low 31.6 percent voter turnout for the December elections.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Electoral Commission manages and organizes the election process, and the electoral laws are generally fair. However, concerns persist. Both the opposition and members of the Dominican diaspora have campaigned for electoral reforms, such as updating voter rolls and issuing voter identification cards.

After the 2019 polls, the Organization of American States (OAS) recommended a series of changes, including issuing photo identification cards to voters, introducing an electronic voting system, undertaking a voter-list review, and introducing party and campaign finance legislation. Despite the DLP government's repeated promises to enact such reforms, no changes were made in 2022.

In late December 2019, the opposition challenged the results of that year's elections in 10 constituencies, alleging they were affected by fraud and bribery. In July 2022, the Caribbean Court of Justice (CCJ) dismissed the case. However, the CCJ noted that "areas of grave concern" about the conduct of the 2019 elections remained, and should be addressed before the country's future elections. The DLP criticized the CCJ's comments, calling the remarks gratuitous and saying that they had sown discord in Dominica.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties are free to organize and operate. The effects of the country's first-past-the-post electoral system has entrenched two-party politics.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties are unencumbered by formal restrictions and are generally free to operate. There has not been a change of party in government since 2000, mostly due to the weakness of the opposition.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and candidates are generally able to express their political choices without undue influence from actors that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

All adult citizens may vote. Women are underrepresented in politics generally. Out of 45 candidates in the 2022 elections, 15 were women, and 10 won seats—an improvement from the 2019 elections. Newly elected independent legislator Jesma Paul was sworn in as leader of the opposition in December.

The Indigenous Carib-Kalinago population participates in the political process, with members generally supporting one of the two major political parties. LGBT+ people face discrimination and are marginalized, impacting their ability to engage fully in political processes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected prime minister, cabinet, and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

While the government generally implements anticorruption laws effectively, domestic and international observers have raised concerns over corruption within Dominica's

Citizenship by Investment (CBI) program, which allows foreigners to gain citizenship through an economic investment in the country. In 2021, the US State Department said in its International Narcotics Control Strategy Report that "Dominica accepts a large number of applicants and sometimes issues passports despite adverse information on applicants uncovered during the vetting process."

In 2019, Al Jazeera published a story claiming that Dominican officials from both major parties, including Skerrit, were willing to receive money in return for political appointments.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government of Dominica generally operates with openness and transparency, though there are concerns that the long-incumbent DLP has been less forthcoming in recent years with information on some programs, including CBI. Government officials are required to submit financial accounts, but these accounts are frequently incomplete. Access to information is not protected by law.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed, and the press is generally free in practice. However, defamation remains a criminal offense punishable by imprisonment or fines. Defamation lawsuits and threats of lawsuits are commonly used by the Skerrit government against members of the media, resulting in some self-censorship. In July 2022, the CCJ alleged that the opposition's access to some state-owned media, including the national radio station, has been restricted.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is protected under the constitution and other laws and is generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are generally free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed under the constitution, and the government has generally respected these rights. However, protests sometimes become violent, or give way to looting or acts of vandalism.

Some unrest took place at opposition protests in 2017, and Prime Minister Skerrit characterized them as threats to state security. Later, several UWP members, including leader Lennox Linton, were charged with incitement and obstruction. The trials were still ongoing as of December 2022.

In March 2022, social activist Atherton Martin began leading weekly walks for "peace, justice, and prosperity in Dominica" in the capital, Roseau. Martin did not seek permission for the walks, as he claimed they were not public processions and therefore did not require official approval. In May, ten participants in the walks, including UWP leader Linton, were charged for participating in unapproved protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and advocacy groups generally operate without interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to organize, strike, and bargain collectively, and laws prohibit antiunion discrimination by employers. However, the country's definition of "essential" workers is broad, extending to those in the agricultural sector, and there are burdensome restrictions on the ability of these workers to strike.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

An independent judiciary is provided for in the constitution, and judicial independence is generally respected. Courts are subordinate to the interisland Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court (ECSC) and the CCJ.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for due process rights, and these are generally observed in practice. While the judicial system generally operates efficiently, staffing shortages remain a problem and can result in prolonged pretrial detention.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

People in Dominica generally enjoy freedom from illegitimate force.

Women's rights are not fully protected. Laws on sexual harassment are weak. Cases of rape are underreported, with significant stigma attached to the crime and little support available for victims.

Same-sex sexual relations are illegal, though the relevant provisions of the Sexual Offences Act are not enforced, a position that has been made clear by Prime Minister Skerrit. In September 2022, the country's High Court heard a constitutional challenge to two sections of the Sexual Offences Act that outlaw consensual same-sex relations. A ruling on the challenge had not been issued by year's end.

Members of the small Indigenous population, the Carib-Kalinago, face discrimination and a variety of accompanying challenges, including high poverty levels and difficulties in obtaining loans from banks. Rastafarians have reported discrimination and profiling by police.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals in Dominica generally enjoy freedom of movement, though those outside the established Carib-Kalinago community must apply for special access to the Carib Reserve area, which is granted by the Carib Council. There are no restrictions on people's ability to change their place of employment or education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The government of Dominica supports both domestic and foreign investment. Property rights are generally safeguarded. However, women have more limited rights because property is traditionally deeded to the head of household, who is usually a man.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Women and children have some limitations on their personal freedoms, including freedom from violence. There is little protection against domestic abuse, and both violence against women and child abuse remain widespread problems.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

Revisions to labor laws have strengthened worker protections in recent years, though violations of overtime laws in the tourism sector have occurred. The labor commissioner operates within the Justice Department and is underresourced. The government has made efforts to address poverty and unemployment, including in the wake of Hurricane Maria, which devastated the island in 2017. In September 2021, the government implemented minimum-wage increases.

In its 2021 Findings on the Worst Forms of Child Labor report, the most recent available, the US Labor Department found no evidence of child labor in Dominica but warned that the government had only made "minimal advancement" in efforts to prevent the practice. Carib-Kalinago children face barriers to education, making them more vulnerable.

Dominican Republic

Population: 11,200,000
Capital: Santo Domingo
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Dominican Republic holds regular elections that are relatively free. Pervasive corruption undermines state institutions and the use of excessive force by police is a problem. Discrimination against Dominicans of Haitian descent and Haitian migrants, as well as against LGBT+ people, remain serious problems.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Anti-Haitian sentiment continued to intensify in the Dominican Republic and the year was marked by an escalation in deportations of Haitian migrants; as of November, more than 136,000 people, reportedly including 1,800 unaccompanied children and hundreds of pregnant women, had been deported to Haiti.

- The Anti-Corruption Office (PEPCA) confirmed in May that former president Danilo Medina was under investigation for his involvement in administrative corruption.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is both head of state and chief of government and is elected to a four-year term. A 2015 constitutional amendment allowed presidents to run for a second term. In 2020, Luis Abinader of the Modern Revolutionary Party (PRM) was elected president over the Dominican Liberation Party (PLD) candidate Gonzalo Castillo, ending the PLD's 16-year tenure. Voter turnout was low at 49.6 percent, compared to 68 percent in 2016.

Observers from the Organization of American States (OAS) monitored the elections and deemed the polls credible, lauding the Central Electoral Board's (JCE's) measures to curb the spread of the coronavirus at polling stations and the consensus among political forces in postponing the election. However, inconsistent enforcement of social distancing and curfew measures benefited the PLD, and both parties used pandemic-related food, services, and medical supplies to incentivize voters. OAS Observers reiterated issues with electronic voting and repeated calls for compliance with parity requirements for women candidates and better supervision of parties' and candidates' finances under existing regulations.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The Dominican Republic's bicameral National Congress consists of the 32-member Senate and the 190-member Chamber of Deputies, with members of both chambers directly elected to four-year terms. The PRM gained majorities in both chambers in the 2020 legislative elections, which were held alongside the presidential election.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Despite its shortcomings, the JCE operates with some transparency and cooperates with election monitors, opposition parties, and other relevant groups. The 2019 Electoral Regime Law and the 2018 Law of Political Parties, Groups, and Movements established the country's new electoral framework. The 2020 elections exposed gaps in the implementation of campaign finance laws—demonstrated by unregulated distribution of gifts and humanitarian aid, candidates' failure to submit required budgets and expenditure reports, and a lack of transparency in public fund allocations to candidates.

New members of the Superior Electoral Court (TSE) were appointed in July 2021. However, a December 2021 Constitutional Court decision invalidated the law that assigned the TSE's jurisdiction to hear electoral crimes trials, recognizing instead ordinary criminal courts.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16

Political parties are generally free to form and operate. However, newer and smaller parties struggle to access public financing and secure equal media coverage. In April 2021, the Constitutional Court allowed parties to maintain legal status if they achieve congressional or municipal representation, expanding the rule that previously required dissolution if they failed to gain at least 1 percent of the vote.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4

Opposition parties and candidates generally do not face selective restrictions during election periods but are disadvantaged by elements of the electoral framework. In July 2020, the main opposition party, the PRM, ended the PLD's 16-year tenure and won a majority in the National Congress.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People are generally free to exercise their political choices. A history of violent police responses to social and political demonstrations may deter political participation by some, and economic oligarchies and organized crime groups have some influence over the political sphere. The Specialized Directorate for Financial Control was established in December 2020 to monitor public and private financing for political parties and electoral candidates.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

A 2013 Constitutional Tribunal decision stripped hundreds of thousands of Dominican-born descendants of Haitian migrants of their citizenship, and thus their right to vote. Discriminatory attitudes and occasional acts of targeted violence against Black Dominicans (perceived to be Haitians) and LGBT+ people discourage their political participation.

None of the key ministerial posts in the president's cabinet are currently held by women, despite the government's stated commitment to promoting gender equality. However, the vice-president is a woman. Gender parity laws requiring between 40 and 60 percent of candidates for the National Congress be women were not respected during the 2020 elections. Women hold 53 seats in the Chamber of Deputies, 28 percent of the total seats, and 4 in the Senate, 13 percent of seats. In September 2022, the OAS and the TSE committed to work on a plan of action to guarantee conditions for full participation of Dominican women in politics, with support from the Inter-American Commission of Women and the Canadian government.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Government and legislative representatives are generally able to determine national policies in a free and unhindered manner.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a serious, systemic problem at all levels of the government, judiciary, and security forces, as well as in the private sector. In May 2022, the Anti-Corruption Office (PEPCA) confirmed that it was investigating former president Danilo Medina and his involvement in administrative corruption. The ongoing investigation into Medina's administration had resulted in the 2020 arrest of Medina's brother and had linked several legislators to drug trafficking and money laundering networks. In July 2022, the Organic Law of Domain Extinction, which made it easier for the government to seize foreign and domestic assets connected to illegal activity, was enacted.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The government does not always operate with transparency. State agencies often provide inaccurate or incomplete responses to information requests. Public officials are required to publicly disclose assets, but NGOs have cast doubt upon the accuracy of these disclosures. Public contracting and purchasing processes are opaque, and a September 2021 report exposed millions of dollars in missing taxes from purchases of luxury and other vehicles imported under the names of Dominican legislators, who have exemptions.

In a September 2022 speech to mark the beginning of an international "Open America" conference held in the Dominican Republic, President Abinader argued that an uptick in reports of corruption is a sign of a more open government because it shows that citizens are empowered to participate in governance. He also touted the findings of the 2021 Open Budget Survey, released in May 2022, in which the Dominican Republic ranked 9th in budget transparency of the 120 countries surveyed.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 41 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Dominican law guarantees freedom of speech and of the press. Several national daily newspapers, many local publications, more than 300 privately owned radio stations, and several private television networks operate in the country alongside the state-owned Radio Televisión Dominicana (RTVD). However, ownership of private outlets is highly concentrated and public funding of media lacks transparency.

Journalists risk intimidation and violence when investigating drug trafficking and corruption and may also face legal or regulatory pressure as a result of their investigations.

In July, Abinader launched an advisory commission led by a journalist to draft an update of the country's 1962 law on free expression. Amid heavy criticism, the government withdrew a cybersecurity bill it had submitted to Congress in June; the bill maintained and in some cases increased criminal punishments for defamation and included other potentially repressive provisions.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is generally upheld. However, the Catholic Church receives special privileges from the state, including funding for construction and exemptions from customs duties. In September 2021, the education minister announced that bibles would be given to public school students.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Constitutional guarantees regarding academic freedom are generally observed.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to express personal views in public and private without fear of retribution or surveillance. In January 2021, the director of police threatened legal consequences for individuals who post content online, including through videos that he called "smear campaigns," portraying or alleging police abuse.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed by the constitution, and demonstrations are common, but sometimes subject to violent dispersal by police. In July 2022, police broke up a demonstration for the reopening of hospitals led by members of the Dominican Medical College (CMD), reportedly assaulting protesters in the process.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is constitutionally guaranteed, and the government respects the right to form civic groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers other than military and police personnel may form and join unions, though over 50 percent of workers at a workplace must be union members to engage in collective bargaining. Workers must exhaust mediation measures and meet other criteria for a strike to be considered legal. In practice, union membership is discouraged, and workers risk dismissal for joining.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

Judicial independence is hampered by corruption and the judiciary is susceptible to political pressure. Reports of selective prosecution and the improper dismissal of cases continue.

Despite a request by the public prosecutor's office that they be tried for embezzlement and fraud, all 11 people charged in the Los Tres Brazos case were exonerated by a judge in June 2022; the case involved a land sale alleged by PEPCA to be corrupt.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Corruption and politicization of the justice system have significant impact on due process, and strongly limit access to justice for people without resources or political connections. Corruption within law enforcement agencies remains a serious challenge.

According to data from the World Prison Brief, around 60 percent of people being held in Dominican prisons are in pretrial detention.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Prisons in the Dominican Republic remain overcrowded, with an occupancy level of more than 162 percent, and rates of murder and other violent crime are high. President Abinader announced in April 2021 the creation of a special commission for police reform after police killed a young couple in their car that month. Police violence continued to be a problem in 2022, with rights advocates saying that race and economic status were often a factor in the illegitimate use of force by Dominican authorities. In May 2022, a public outcry followed the death of David de los Santos, a 24-year-old who had been fatally injured while in police custody. Seven people, including four police officers, were arrested soon after his death, which was the third death of someone in police custody in a month.

Dominicans with European features or lighter skin color enjoy systemic advantages. Dominican-Haitians and Haitian migrants continue to face persistent discrimination, which was exacerbated by unrest in Haiti in 2021 and 2022. They face obstacles in securing legal documents and difficulty registering their children as Dominican citizens, and without identification, they are ineligible for any social assistance. In October 2022, 14 social and human rights organizations demanded action from the attorney general's office to combat hate crimes and human rights violations against Haitian immigrants, citing several recent examples.

Dominican authorities deported tens of thousands of people to Haiti in 2022 despite unrest and dangerous conditions there. More than 136,000 people had been deported as of November, reportedly including hundreds of pregnant women and 1,800 unaccompanied children.

In the World Economic Forum's 2022 Global Gender Gap Report, published in July, the Dominican Republic rose to 84 out of 146 countries in the Global Gender Gap Index, up from 89 in 2021.

LGBT+ people experience occasional violence, as well as discrimination in employment, education, and health services. They are barred from working in certain public sectors, such as the police and armed forces.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10/ 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Asylum seekers and refugees must pay a fee to gain travel documents. People of Haitian descent without identification cards cannot attend university or obtain formal jobs.

In February 2022, President Abinader lifted COVID-19-related movement restrictions. Construction of a border wall between the Dominican Republic and Haiti that would inhibit the movement of thousands of Haitian workers began in February 2022 and progressed steadily during the year.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Private business activity remains susceptible to undue influence by organized crime and corrupt officials.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Violence and discrimination against women remain pervasive. In January 2021, President Abinader prohibited marriage for individuals under 18 years of age and issued a decree that created the Cabinet for Women, Young Women, and Girls within his office. In September 2022, the government, the Korea International Cooperation Agency (KOICA), and UNICEF launched a four-year initiative to prevent childhood marriages.

Poor medical care has left the country with one of the highest maternal mortality rates in the region, though a public health bulletin in July 2022 indicated that that rate fell by 36 percent in the first five months of the year, from 96 in the same period of 2021 to 63. Meanwhile, a total ban on abortion had been in place since 2015.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Many workers in the country are employed informally, leaving them without legal protections. Haitians who lack documentation and clear legal status are particularly susceptible to forced labor but are often overlooked by antitrafficking initiatives. The US Department of Labor in September 2022 released its seventh report since 2013 documenting poor working conditions and abuses of labor rights in the Dominican Republic's sugar industry, which primarily employs Haitian migrants and Dominicans of Haitian descent.

The Dominican Republic remains a source, transit, and destination country for the trafficking of men, women, and children for sexual exploitation and forced labor. The US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons report classified the country as Tier 2, grouping it with countries whose governments do not fully meet minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards. Notably, in August 2022, a large human trafficking network was dismantled, with at least 80 Venezuelan and Colombian women rescued; 16 people, including active police and former military personnel, were charged for running a sex trafficking network.

Ecuador

Population: 18,000,000
Capital: Quito
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Elections take place regularly, and some key state institutions have recently displayed greater independence. Freedoms for media and civil society expanded under former president Lenín Moreno, the chosen successor of leftist Rafael Correa. The 2021 elections marked the first time in 14 years that neither Correa nor his preferred candidate won the presidency. Ongoing challenges include official corruption, due process violations, and violence in prisons and during protests.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, Indigenous activists initiated a series of protests against the economic policies of President Guillermo Lasso. The protests, which were characterized by violent clashes between protesters and security forces, lasted for 17 days and led to nationwide fuel and food shortages; the government was eventually forced to concede to several of the protesters' demands.
- Also in June, opposition legislators moved to impeach President Lasso over "the serious political crisis" caused by the protests. The impeachment bid did not succeed, and Lasso remained in office at year's end.
- Violent crimes related to drug trafficking and organized criminal groups continued to escalate during the year. Authorities recorded over 4,500 homicides by year's end, more than double the number recorded the previous year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 30 / 40 (−1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 2008 constitution provides for a directly elected president. The president has the authority to dissolve the legislature, which triggers new elections for both the assembly and the presidency. In 2018, voters approved a referendum that restored term limits, which had been eliminated in a 2015 constitutional amendment under former president Correa; the president can now serve up to two terms, which effectively bars Correa from reclaiming the presidency.

In April 2021, Guillermo Lasso, who had unsuccessfully run for president twice before, defeated Union for Hope (UNES) candidate Andrés Arauz, winning 52 percent of the vote.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Ecuador has a 137-seat unicameral National Assembly, with 116 members directly elected, 15 elected by proportional representation, and 6 elected through multiseat constituencies for Ecuadorians living abroad. Members may serve a maximum of two four-year terms.

International and domestic observers generally praised the February 2021 legislative elections as credible and fair. While no party won a majority, UNES, the new party formed by Rafael Correa and his allies, secured 49 seats, followed by Pachakutik with 27. The Social Christian Party (PSC) and the Democratic Left (ID) both won 18. President Lasso's party, Creating Opportunities (CREO) obtained only 12.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

During the Correa era, the National Electoral Council (CNE) had generally been considered government-controlled. The body faced some criticism for its administration of the 2017 elections, including for slow vote counting and irregularities in the voter rolls. In response to the criticism, the transitional National Council of Citizen Participation and Social Control (CPCCS), which is responsible for appointing CNE members, dismissed all sitting CNE members in July 2018, and that November, five newly appointed members began a six-year term. The new members have generally displayed greater independence and transparency than their predecessors.

The Observatory on Latin American (OLA), a research center at The New School University in New York, praised the CNE for how the 2021 elections were organized, for successfully implementing recommendations from international election observers and the OAS, and publishing the results quickly and accurately.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

According to the 2008 constitution, political organizations must collect voters' signatures equivalent to 1.5 percent of the electoral roll to register and participate in general elections. If a party or group fails to win 4 percent of the vote for two consecutive elections, its registration can be revoked, disadvantaging smaller parties. Recent elections have seen a significant rise in electoral competition: the 2021 elections featured 16 presidential candidates and 17 legislative party lists.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

For decades, Ecuador's political parties have been largely personality based, clientelist, and fragile. Proud and Sovereign Fatherland (PAIS), the largest bloc in the legislature during the Correa administration, split after former president Moreno came to power, with one faction loyal to Moreno and the other loyal to Correa; ahead of the 2019 polls the latter group left the ruling party and joined the Citizens' Revolution party.

Smaller establishment parties such as the PSC and newer parties have successfully gained representation in recent years. Lasso's victory in the 2021 presidential election marked the first time in 14 years that neither Correa nor a candidate affiliated with one of Correa's parties became president.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

The people's political choices are generally free from domination by powerful groups that are not democratically accountable. However, wealthy business interests can undermine democratic accountability by facilitating or encouraging corruption among elected officials.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Ecuador's constitution promotes nondiscrimination and provides for the adoption of affirmative action measures to promote equality and representation of marginalized groups. In practice, however, Indigenous groups often lack a voice in key decisions pertaining to their land and resources. Nonetheless, Indigenous groups are an important force in national politics. Yaku Pérez of Indigenous-affiliated party Pachakutik finished in third place in the first round of the 2021 presidential election. Pachakutik became the second largest legislative bloc in the concurrent legislative polls and Pachakutik member Guadalupe Llori became the first Indigenous woman to preside over the National Assembly.

Though the Lasso administration has committed to working towards women's equality, his government has faced criticism for failing to do so, including by not fulfilling Lasso's promise of gender parity within his cabinet.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12 (−1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4 (−1)

Elected officials are generally free to set and implement government policy without undue interference from nonstate actors. An escalating security crisis—marked by a rapid rise in homicides and other violent crime in the country since 2021, largely driven by drug-related gang activity—poses a threat to the ability of the elected government to effectively and freely govern. Organized crime groups routinely intimidate, bribe, and attack government officials, and their presence has weakened state control of institutions, especially Ecuador's prison system.

Other nongovernmental groups have used violent tactics to influence government policies. In June 2022, large antigovernment protests led by the Confederation of Indigenous Nationalities of the Ecuadorian Amazon (CONAIE) saw protesters block roads and attack security forces while demanding that the government change its economic policies, among other things. The government was forced to concede to several of the protesters' demands, including agreeing to lower fuel prices and restrict mining in protected areas.

Hostility between the legislature and executive has increased in recent years, impeding government efforts to make and implement policies. In June 2022, opposition legislators moved to impeach President Lasso over "the serious political crisis and internal commotion" caused by that month's Indigenous-led antigovernment protests. Ultimately, the opposition did not garner enough votes to impeach Lasso.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because the ability of the elected leadership to govern effectively has been constrained by unelected forces, including Indigenous protesters who used blockades and threats of violence to force policy changes and criminal organizations whose numerous bombings and other attacks undermined state control in some areas.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Ecuador has long been racked by corruption, and the weak judiciary and lack of investigative capacity in government oversight agencies contribute to an environment of impunity. Although the Moreno administration initially emphasized anticorruption efforts and several prominent politicians have faced investigation and prosecution in recent years, corruption scandals rocked the country during the COVID-19 pandemic, illustrating the depth of the challenge of effectively combating graft. In September 2021, the Lasso administration estimated the cost of corruption between 2007 and 2019 at approximately $68 billion.

In October 2022, energy minister Xavier Vera resigned after becoming the focus of a corruption investigation that began when a local media outlet released audio recordings suggesting that Vera had exchanged jobs at the state-owned oil company PetroEcuador for payment.

Other high-profile corruption probes during the year included an investigation into an alleged corruption network within PetroEcuador during the Correa administration. According to former energy secretary and PetroEcuador CEO Carlos Pareja Yannuzzelli, who testified about the case before the legislature in November, Correa was involved in a corruption scheme related to "irregular practices in oil contracting" that allegedly resulted in the loss of more than $5 billion. The investigation was ongoing as of November.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The law guarantees citizens' right to access public information. Although compliance has improved over the years, some government bodies remain reluctant to disclose such information. Public procurement processes are frequently opaque and malpractice involving government contracts is common.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 40 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Media freedom improved after former president Moreno took office in 2017. His administration permitted more diverse coverage in the country's state-run media, which had previously shown clear bias toward Correa and PAIS. In 2018, the National Assembly reformed the restrictive Organic Communications Law, including by eliminating the notorious Superintendency of Information and Communication (SUPERCOM), which monitored media content, investigated journalists, and issued fines and other sanctions.

Nonetheless, challenges to press freedom remain. Members of the media face harassment and attacks, which are often met with impunity. In 2022, a number of journalists were attacked in their homes, and at least two were killed in relation to their work. Several journalists were attacked while covering the June protests. In an October report, the Inter American Press Association (IAPA) noted that such violence and impunity significantly worsened between August 2021 and August 2022, limiting press freedom in the country.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

In 2018, the National Assembly approved reforms to the Organic Law on Higher Education, which restored public funding for research at universities that operate in Ecuador under international agreements. In August 2021, the Lasso administration proposed amendments to the same law that would strengthen the autonomy of universities and independence of students in Ecuador.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Discussion of controversial topics among private citizens is generally free. However, crackdowns on social media have led some online outlets to disable sections for public comments for fear of reprisals, limiting the freedom of private discussion online.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Protests occur regularly throughout the country without incident. However, national security legislation provides a broad definition of sabotage and terrorism, extending to acts against persons and property by unarmed individuals, which can be used to limit assembly rights. In May 2020, the Ministry of Defense issued a regulation authorizing soldiers' use of lethal force in situations that potentially included protests. Following a challenge by rights groups, the Constitutional Court suspended the regulation that June, pending a full decision.

In October 2021, Indigenous communities initiated mass protests as President Lasso proposed an increase in fuel prices. Protesters blocked major roads and were prevented from entering the presidential palace by riot police.

In June 2022, CONAIE initiated another demonstration that saw Indigenous activists march to Quito to protest the government's economic policies and demand that the Lasso administration uphold Indigenous land rights. Though the protests began peacefully, they quickly escalated into "abhorrent violence." Protesters attacked journalists and security forces; briefly held dozens of security officers captive; and blockaded roads, leading to nationwide fuel and food shortages. President Lasso imposed a state of emergency after the protests began, limiting the freedom of assembly and mobilizing military forces. Authorities responded violently to the protests, using excessive force and arbitrary arrests to repress the demonstrations. Hundreds of protesters and security forces were injured during the 17 days of demonstrations, and at least seven people, including one soldier, were killed.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

In 2017, the Moreno administration rescinded controversial Correa-era decrees that heavily restricted nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and their ability to operate. However, though observers saw improvements under the Moreno administration, many criticized the retention of excessive government regulatory power. Current NGO regulations allow authorities to close organizations perceived to be participating in politics, or organizations deemed to perform activities different from those for which they were created.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Private-sector labor unions have the right to strike, though the labor code limits public-sector strikes. Only a small portion of the general workforce is unionized, partly because many people work in the informal sector.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Ecuador's highest-ranking judicial bodies are the 21-member National Court of Justice and the 9-member Constitutional Court. Both courts faced attacks on their autonomy during the Correa era, but judicial independence increased during the Moreno administration. The passage of the 2018 referendum restructured the CPCCS, a powerful body responsible for appointing the attorney general, and the Judiciary Council, which appoints judges. All CPCCS members, who were considered allies of the Correa government, and Judiciary Council members were replaced.

More controversially, the transitional CPCCS had significant influence over the composition of the Constitutional Court, despite its lack of jurisdiction. The transitional CPCCS voted to remove all nine judges on the court, citing corruption and a lack of independence within the body, and created a committee to select the court's new members, who were selected and approved in early 2019. Later that year, the new court ratified the legality of the transitional CPCCS's actions.

In October 2022, legislators from UNES and PSC attempted to impeach members of the Judiciary Council for their roles in the 2019 evaluation and removal of National Court justices. The motion to impeach did not pass, and was dismissed in October.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Judicial processes remain slow, and procedures designed to expedite cases have been implemented at the detriment of defendants' due process rights. Many people are held in pretrial detention for longer than is permitted by law. While the number of public defenders has increased in recent years, the state is still unable to provide adequate legal counsel for all defendants who are unable to supply their own.

During his tenure, former president Correa and his allies frequently intervened in court cases, telling judges how they should rule, and sometimes removing judges who refused to comply. Under former president Moreno, such blatant interference in court proceedings diminished, allowing defendants more fair public hearings of their cases.

Despite improvements in the post-Correa era, reports of due process infringements, including trial delays and "improper pressure" on the judiciary have continued during the Lasso administration.

Allegations of police abuse of suspects and detainees are common. In August 2022, legislation regulating the use of force by security personnel came into effect. However, reports of excessive use of force by police continued.

Multiple groups that conducted investigations into the 2019 protest violence, including the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR), found that state agents committed human rights violations during the protests, but investigations had not yielded charges.

Prisons are overcrowded and understaffed, and gang- and drug-related violence is rampant. As of October 2022, there are more than 32,000 inmates, 41 percent of whom are awaiting trial. Major security incidents regularly occur in Ecuadorian prisons, where more than 400 inmates were killed between February 2021 and November 2022. In September 2021, 119 inmates were killed in a high-security prison in Guayaquil after a dispute between two rival criminal gangs became violent. Various media outlets reported that the aggressors were heavily armed with machetes, knives, rifles, semiautomatic weapons, and grenades.

The events in Guayaquil highlighted the state's inability to protect prisoners from gangs and drug cartels, and was the most fatal such incident in the country's history.

Ecuador experienced a significant increase in violent crime in 2022, recording over 4,500 homicides—more than double the number recorded during the previous year—the country's "highest homicide rate in decades," according to Interior Minister Juan Zapata. Zapata attributed 83 percent of these deaths to drug trafficking and gang activity.

In response to a series of car bombs and explosions in Guayaquil and Esmeraldas in November, President Lasso declared a state of emergency to allow police and armed forces to conduct security operations aimed at curbing the violence.

Indigenous people continue to suffer widespread societal discrimination, and oil-drilling and mining projects on Indigenous lands are frequently carried out without consulting local Indigenous communities, as required by the constitution. In July 2020, the Constitutional Court reinforced consultation requirements for proposed changes to the status of Indigenous ancestral territories.

Ecuador is one of the largest recipients of refugees in Latin America. According to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), Ecuador hosted over 502,000 Venezuelans as of the end of 2022. Many Venezuelan immigrants have reported facing discrimination and xenophobia, amid unfounded accusations that their arrival has caused a spike in crime and violence in the country. In addition, approximately 250,000 refugees from Colombia have entered Ecuador since the late 1990s, and thousands have remained.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement outside and inside the country is largely unrestricted. Workers in the palm oil industry, however, have faced restrictions on their movement imposed by employers, including curfews. Individuals may generally determine their place of employment and education.

Freedom of movement was limited during the June 2022 protests, both by demonstrators using road blockades as a protest tactic and government forces, who closed the main roads in Quito for several days. A state of emergency imposed by President Lasso in response to the protests also limited free movement until it was lifted later that month.

The government does not impose significant restrictions on the right to own property and establish private businesses. However, widespread corruption by both public officials and private-sector actors can obstruct normal business activity and weakens the protection of property rights.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

In June 2019, the Constitutional Court narrowly ruled that the marriage ban on same-sex couples was unconstitutional, based on a previous opinion by the IACHR that recommended the recognition of same-sex marriage. The Constitutional Court ruling divided public opinion, but same-sex couples successfully applied for marriage licenses in the following months. Civil unions had previously been recognized in Ecuador.

Ecuador faces significant ongoing challenges in protecting women from violence and abuse. A study from the National Institute of Statistics and Censuses (INEC) found that 65 percent of Ecuadorian women had suffered abuse in some form during their lives. More than 270 femicides were committed between January and November 2022 according to the Latin American Association for Alternative Development (Aldea). In one high-profile case, lawyer María Bélen Bernal was allegedly killed by her husband, a police lieutenant, on the grounds of a Quito police academy in September; an investigation remained ongoing at year's end.

Abortion remains a crime in Ecuador, with few exceptions. In April 2022, the legislature passed a law—enacted later that month—decriminalizing abortion in the case of rape. The legislation passed in April was significantly more restrictive than an earlier version of the bill, passed by the National Assembly in February but vetoed by President Lasso in March.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Men, women, and children are sometimes subjected to forced labor and sex work in Ecuador; Indigenous and Afro-Ecuadorian individuals, as well as migrants and refugees, remain most vulnerable. The economic disruption caused by the COVID-19 pandemic further increased migrants' economic precarity and vulnerability.

The government has taken some action to address the problem of economic exploitation, including by increasing trafficking-related law enforcement operations. However, services for victims are inadequate, and some public officials believed to be complicit in trafficking operations have escaped punishment.

Egypt

Population: 103,500,000
Capital: Cairo
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, who first took power in a 2013 coup, has governed Egypt in an increasingly authoritarian manner. Meaningful political opposition is virtually nonexistent, as expressions of dissent can draw criminal prosecution and imprisonment. Civil liberties, including press freedom and freedom of assembly, are tightly restricted. Security forces engage in human rights abuses and extrajudicial killing with impunity. Discrimination against women, LGBT+ people, and other groups remain serious problems, as do high rates of sexual and gender-based violence.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In August, at least 41 people, including 18 children, died when an electrical fire swept through a Coptic Christian church in Giza Governorate. Rights groups claimed that discriminatory government policies and restrictions on the construction and renovation of churches resulted in unsafe conditions in the church, which ultimately caused the fire.

- The Arab Network for Human Rights Information (ANHRI), a prominent human rights group, suspended its Egyptian operations in January. Its founder, Gamal Eid, claimed he had experienced years of harassment from authorities, including the freezing of his assets, a travel ban, and physical assault.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 6 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

President al-Sisi, who took power in a 2013 coup while serving as Egypt's defense minister and armed forces commander, has been elected only through unfair, noncompetitive contests. In the 2018 elections, Sisi received 97 percent of the votes after pressuring all opposition candidates to withdraw. The vote was marred by low turnout, the use of state resources and media to support Sisi's candidacy, voter intimidation, and vote buying.

Constitutional amendments adopted in 2019 added two years to Sisi's current term, extending it through 2024, at which point he will be allowed to seek an additional six-year term. Future presidents will be limited to two six-year terms.

The 2019 amendments to the 2014 constitution reestablished the Egyptian parliament as a bicameral body in which members serve five-year terms. The upper house, the Senate, consists of 300 seats and has no significant legislative competencies. Two-thirds of senators are elected (half through closed party lists and half in individual seats) and one-third are appointed by the president. The House of Representatives consists of 568 members, half elected through closed party lists and half in individual seats. The president has the right to appoint 28 additional members to the House.

The 2020 elections to both parliamentary bodies were marred by the widespread detention and intimidation of individuals who criticized the process, low turnout, claims of fraud, vote buying, and severe interference by security apparatuses. No credible groups were allowed to monitor the elections.

Without any competitor lists, the Unified National List, headed by the regime-allied Mostaqbal Watan (Nation's Future) Party, won all 100 party-list seats and 88 individual seats in the Senate; Mostaqbal Watan also won all 284 party-list seats and 31 individual seats in the House of Representatives. Another proregime party, independents, and small parties took the remaining seats in both houses. In October 2020, President Sisi appointed 100 mostly proregime members to the Senate.

Egypt has not held elections for local councils since 2008, and the last elected local councils were dissolved in 2011.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

While electoral laws provide an ostensible basis for credible elections, electoral authorities fail to ensure an open and competitive campaign environment. The board of the National Electoral Commission (NEC) consists of senior judges drawn from some of Egypt's highest courts, who serve six-year terms. The NEC's establishing legislation phases out direct judicial supervision of elections by 2024, which critics argue will further damage the integrity of elections and reduce public trust in the results.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

Political parties are legally allowed to form and operate, but in practice, activists, opposition parties, and political movements that criticize the regime face arrests, harsh prison terms, death sentences, extrajudicial violence, and other forms of pressure. In the Al-Amal (Hope) Coalition case, at least 15 individuals were detained in 2019 before launching a secular coalition to run in the 2020 parliamentary elections. In November 2021, an emergency court gave multiyear prison sentences without appeal to many of its leaders. While some members of this group were released in 2022, thousands of opposition members remained imprisoned and live in unsanitary conditions.

Parties formed based on religion are forbidden. While some Islamist parties still operate in a precarious legal position, the Muslim Brotherhood was outlawed in 2013 as a terrorist organization, and its political party was banned. Since then, authorities have systematically persecuted its members.

By extending presidential term lengths and limits in 2019, controlling the electoral process, intimidating presidential and parliamentary candidates, and arresting and prosecuting those seeking to contest elections, the Sisi regime makes it nearly impossible for the opposition to gain power through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Since the 2013 coup, the military and intelligence agencies dominate the political system, with most power and patronage flowing from Sisi and his domestic allies in the armed forces and security agencies. Regional support from the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia helped stabilize the regime domestically and globally. Most of Egypt's provincial governors are former military or police commanders. Vaguely worded 2019 constitutional amendments further strengthened the legal underpinnings of the military's political influence, calling on it to "protect the constitution and democracy" for the sake of citizens' rights that are not respected by Egyptian authorities.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The constitution and Egyptian laws grant political rights to all citizens regardless of religion, gender, race, ethnicity, or any other such distinction. However, Christians, Shiite Muslims, people of color, and LGBT+ people face discrimination and are denied access to rights, which in turn affects their ability to participate in political life. Sisi and the security apparatus's increasing control of elections and other aspects of society only permit these groups to represent their interests within the narrow scope of officially sanctioned politics or risk harsh penalties for transgressing stated and unstated red lines. The diminishing power of the legislature further undercuts avenues for meaningful representation.

Women generally do not see their interests represented in politics and held 27.5 percent of seats in the House of Representatives as of December 2021, in large part due to legal gender quotas.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

President Sisi and the security apparatus dominate the policymaking process. The parliament has neither a significant role in forming and debating laws, nor the ability to provide a meaningful check on executive power. Laws originating in Sisi's cabinet receive parliamentary approval without meaningful contestation or deliberation.

The 2019 constitutional amendments further consolidated Sisi's authority and increased the military's constitutional role in civilian governance and already considerable independence from civilian oversight. The amendments allow the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces to permanently control the appointment of the defense minister, who is also the commander in chief.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is pervasive at all levels of government. Official mechanisms for investigating and punishing corrupt activity remain weak and ineffective. President Sisi controls the Administrative Control Authority, the body responsible for most anticorruption initiatives. It lacks credibility, transparency, and impartiality and is not allowed to monitor the economic activities of the military.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The Sisi administration provides little transparency regarding government spending and operations and denies civil society groups and independent journalists opportunities to comment on, oversee, or influence state policies through intimidation and censorship.

Although the government makes its budget documents, including debt obligations, accessible to the public, data on debt held by state-owned enterprises (SOEs) remains inaccessible. Moreover, state budget documents do not include allocations to military SOEs, and audits for large SOEs are never public. The military is notoriously opaque with its budget and extensive business interests.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 12 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The Egyptian media sector is dominated by progovernment outlets; most critical or opposition-oriented outlets were shut down in the wake of the 2013 coup. Private media are owned by businesspeople and individuals tied to the military and intelligence services. Intelligence apparatuses seek to limit citizens' accessibility to credible information while shaping citizen attitudes by promoting conspiracy theories, disinformation, and animosity toward the political opposition.

Independent reporting is suppressed through restrictive laws and intimidation, and foreign journalists face obstruction by the state. The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) recorded that 12 journalists had been killed, 21 were imprisoned, and 1 went missing in 2022.

Multiple laws allow authorities to censor online content without judicial approval and block any website considered to be a threat to national security—a broad stipulation that is vulnerable to abuse. Since 2017, Egyptian authorities have banned hundreds of websites, and continued to do so in 2022. Penal-code amendments passed in 2021 tightened punishments for journalists who cover criminal trial sessions without prior approval and toughened penalties for disclosing classified information. The amendments also increased potential fines and allow for prison terms between six months and five years for these offenses.

While Article 2 of the 2014 constitution declares Islam to be the official religion, Article 64 states that "freedom of belief is absolute." Most Egyptians are Sunni Muslims. Coptic Christians form a substantial minority, and there are smaller numbers of Shiite Muslims, non-Coptic Christian denominations, and other groups. Religious minorities and atheists have faced persecution and violence, with Coptic Christians in particular suffering numerous cases of forced displacement, physical assaults, bomb and arson attacks, and blocking of church construction in recent years. Informal reconciliation sessions following instances of sectarian conflict have denied Coptic Christians justice for acts of violence against them. Religious minority groups are often persecuted for expressing their beliefs publicly and are sometimes charged with blasphemy by the authorities.

In August 2022, an electrical fire swept through a Coptic Christian church in Giza Governorate, killing at least 41 people, including 18 children. Rights groups claimed that discriminatory government policies and restrictions on the construction and renovation of churches resulted in the conditions that ultimately caused the fire. In January, security forces in al-Minya Governorate arrested nine Coptic Christians protesting authorities' refusal to rebuild a church in their village, releasing them two months later.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The state controls education and curriculums in public schools and to a lesser degree in some private institutions. Faculty members and departments have some autonomy in shaping specific courses, though many scholars self-censor to avoid punitive measures. University professors can be dismissed for on-campus political activity, and several prominent academics are in prison for expressing political views. The government imposes strict requirements for academics to obtain approval from security officials for travel abroad, and many have been subject to prosecution by emergency courts. Authorities have significant control over the appointment of university presidents and can expel students for political reasons.

Since 2013, university students have been subjected to arrest, disciplinary sanctions such as expulsion, military trials, and extrajudicial killings for their political activism.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Individuals who express personal views contrary to preferred state narratives are subject to reprisals. Security agencies extensively surveil and tightly regulate social media companies and users, as well as other mobile phone applications, allowing them to control public discourse.

Arrests of activists over social media posts and other activities are common and send a clear message that voicing dissent is intolerable, which contributes to self-censorship among ordinary Egyptians. Dozens of Egyptian activists, rights defenders, and journalists have been targeted by digital phishing attacks as part of an apparent campaign to intimidate and silence critics of the government. Moreover, authorities have targeted content creators on social media platforms, most notably TikTok, charging them with various spurious crimes. Progovernment media figures and state officials regularly call for national unity and suggest that only enemies of the state would criticize authorities.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Though the constitution guarantees the right to free assembly, the Interior Ministry can legally ban, postpone, or relocate protests with a court's approval. Unauthorized gatherings of 10 or more people can be dispersed forcefully. Protest organizers must inform police of their plans at least three days in advance. Thousands of protesters have been arrested since these strict laws were introduced in 2013, and some jailed protesters have received death sentences. Because of this crackdown, protests are extremely rare.

In November 2022, during the UN Climate Change Conference (COP27), Egyptian authorities arrested and charged at least 138 protesters with joining a terrorist group, spreading false news, inciting terrorist crimes, and misusing social media.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 0 / 4

In recent years, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have faced mass closures as well as harassment in the form of office raids, arrests of members, lengthy legal cases, and restrictions on travel. A 2019 law constrains the activities of NGOs deemed to threaten national security, public morals, and public order and imposes onerous reporting requirements and intrusive monitoring systems. Punishments for violations of the law are severe.

The Arab Network for Human Rights Information (ANHRI) suspended its Egyptian operations in January 2022, claiming its founder had experienced years of harassment from authorities, including freezing of his assets, a travel ban, and physical assault.

Political dissidents and human rights defenders abroad experience transnational repression, while their families in Egypt have increasingly faced persecution by state authorities.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The government only recognizes unions affiliated with the state-controlled Egyptian Trade Union Federation. While Article 15 of the constitution provides for the right to organize peaceful strikes, they are not tolerated in practice, and the law on protests prohibits gatherings that impede labor and production. Striking workers have in the past been arrested and prosecuted. Workers at military-owned businesses are subject to trials by military courts. Authorities failed to protect striking workers in 2021, allowing the large manufacturing company LORD International to unfairly dismiss and punish workers on strike.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The executive branch exerts influence over the courts, which typically protect the interests of the government, military, and security apparatus and have often disregarded due process and other basic safeguards in cases against the government's political opponents and all forms of independent expression. The 2019 constitutional amendments further strengthened the president's supervisory and appointment powers over the judiciary and undermined its independence.

In July 2022, President Sisi appointed a military general to be the Supreme Constitutional Court's first deputy justice, which further placed the country's institutions under Sisi's control. The emergency courts that Sisi used to prosecute government critics and opposition figures were in effect until October 2021, when the state of emergency was suspended.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Since 2013, Egyptian authorities have increasingly imposed months- or even years-long pretrial detentions on opposition members, journalists, and activists as retribution for their activities. These due process violations have normalized the use of the justice system for political purposes.

Although the constitution limits military trials of civilians, a 2014 presidential decree placed all "public and vital facilities" under military jurisdiction, resulting in the referral of thousands of civilian defendants to military courts. That change was made permanent in November 2021. Charges brought in military courts are often vague or fabricated, defendants are denied due process, and basic evidentiary standards are routinely disregarded.

In October 2021, President Sisi suspended the state of emergency imposed in 2017, which should have ended the use of emergency courts that do not satisfy the minimum standards of fair trials. However, his decision did not preclude hearing cases that were already referred to those courts, nor did it invalidate repressive legislation that was integrated into criminal law.

In April 2022, President Sisi reactivated so-called pardon committees to review the status of political prisoners; while 332 people were reportedly pardoned as of August, authorities arbitrarily detained far more people during the same period.

Police brutality and impunity for abuses by security forces were catalysts for the 2011 uprising against former president Hosni Mubarak, but no reforms have since been enacted and security forces continue to wield illegitimate force with impunity. Counterterrorism laws provide a vague definition of terrorism and grant law enforcement personnel sweeping powers and immunity in enforcement. Prison conditions are very poor, and prisons were grossly unequipped during the COVID-19 pandemic to treat the illness or prevent its spread. Inmates are subject to physical abuse, overcrowding, unsanitary conditions, and denial of medical care.

Since President Sisi effectively came to power, dozens of people have died in custody amid credible reports of torture or denial of timely and adequate health care. In 2021 alone, at least 52 detainees died in custody following medical complications and at least 4 following reports of torture. Prominent economist and government critic Ayman Hadhoud, who had been researching the military's role in the economy, disappeared in February 2022 and died in March, likely due to physical assault and torture he experienced while in custody. Use of the death penalty has increased dramatically since Sisi took power, despite serious concerns about due process violations and politicized prosecutions.

Conflict continues between security forces and adherents of the Islamic State (IS) militant group based in the North Sinai region. Terrorist attacks and military operations have resulted in civilian casualties. For years, Egyptian security forces have carried out extrajudicial executions while claiming that the victims had been killed in shootouts.

Though the constitution stipulates equality for women, women face extensive discrimination, particularly in employment and in the justice system. Coptic Christians, other religious minorities such as Baha'i people, people with dark skin from southern Egypt, people with disabilities, LGBT+ people, and migrants and refugees from sub-Saharan Africa also face various forms of discrimination and harassment. In March 2022, Amnesty International called on the government to halt the deportations of Eritrean nationals, accusing it of engaging in refoulement.

There are different personal status laws governing Muslims and Christians, which commonly results in discrimination against Christians.

While same-sex sexual conduct is not explicitly banned, people suspected of such activity can be charged with prostitution or "debauchery." The police regularly arrest people on such charges.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of movement, but internal travel and access are restricted tightly in North Sinai and to a lesser extent in other governorates along Egypt's borders. Sinai residents are subject to curfews, checkpoints, and other obstacles to travel.

Individuals seeking to change their place of employment or education can encounter bureaucratic barriers and scrutiny from security officials. In addition, a growing list of rights activists, journalists, political party members, bloggers, and academics have been subjected to arbitrary international travel bans in recent years. Foreign researchers and activists have been expelled or denied entry to the country.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Under Sisi, the military is woven into many aspects of Egypt's economy. It runs businesses, produces goods, and manages megaprojects and infrastructure that benefit from tax and customs exemptions, free labor through the use of conscripted soldiers, lack of public budget oversight, and allocation of land through presidential decrees. Opportunities for private businesses are limited. Prominent businessmen faced political harassment, arrest, travel bans, and defamation in state-owned media.

Property rights in Sinai and other border areas are affected by the activities of security forces. Women are at a legal disadvantage in property and inheritance matters, typically receiving half the inheritance due to a man. Societal biases also discourage women's ownership of land.

In November 2021, President Sisi approved legal amendments that gave the Egyptian military the authority to secure vital facilities including gas stations, gas lines, oil fields, railways, road networks, and bridges. According to the amendments, crimes against public and vital facilities and properties are subject to the military judiciary's jurisdiction.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Domestic violence, sexual harassment, and female genital mutilation (FGM) are still among the most acute problems in Egyptian society. While the penalties for FGM were toughened in 2021, the laws' implementation is hindered by societal resistance, poor enforcement, police abuses, and lack of adequate protection for witnesses, all of which deter victims from contacting authorities. Spousal rape is not a crime. Several violent crimes against women in 2022 highlighted the pervasiveness of gender-based violence, including three prominent cases of femicide.

Personal status rules based on religious affiliation put women at a disadvantage in marriage, divorce, and custody matters. Muslim women cannot marry non-Muslim men, for example, and the Coptic Church rarely permits divorce.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Women and children, migrants from sub-Saharan Africa and Asia, and Syrian refugees are vulnerable to forced labor and sex trafficking in Egypt. Authorities routinely punish individuals for offenses that stemmed directly from their circumstances as trafficking victims. Military conscripts are exploited as cheap labor for military- or state-affiliated development projects.

In March 2022, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that authorities forced least 30 Sudanese refugees and asylum seekers who had been arrested in late 2021 to provide labor.

El Salvador

Population: 6,300,000
Capital: San Salvador
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Elections in El Salvador are largely credible and free. However, widespread corruption undermines democracy and the rule of law, and lack of physical security remains a grave problem. Authorities have pursued a harsh, militarized response to the country's powerful criminal gangs, resulting in extrajudicial killings, mass arbitrary arrests, and other abuses. Members of the active civil society sector and dynamic press risk harassment and violence in connection with coverage of organized crime, corruption, and criticism of government policy.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Following rumors that informal agreements between President Nayib Bukele's government and the leaders of criminal gangs had broken down, in March the government instituted an open-ended, unconstitutional state of exception. Along with the state of exception, authorities suspended constitutional protections of assembly and association and routinely violated citizens' privacy by allowing law enforcement to access and surveil individuals' communications without a court order. Further, the criminal code was amended to mandate pretrial detention for charges of gang membership, homicide, and extortion, and to remove the limit on the duration of pretrial detention in these cases, effectively establishing unlimited incarceration without a conviction.
- The government used the state of exception to carry out a staggering crackdown beginning in March, indefinitely and arbitrarily arresting more than 60,000 people by the end of the year, all to allegedly prevent gang-related activity. Authorities eliminated arrested people's due process guarantees and quashed access to public information regarding the crackdown. Criminal courts have remanded virtually all detainees to indefinite custody, without individual scrutiny or respect for due process.
- A January report published by multiple human rights and research groups found that at least 35 Salvadoran journalists had been targeted with Pegasus spyware in 2020 and 2021, allegedly by the Salvadoran government, although the researchers could not definitively prove this. In July, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) granted protection measures to more journalists in El Salvador who had owned devices that were compromised by Pegasus surveillance; the IACHR also provided protections to journalists in February 2021.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 25 / 40 (−1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

El Salvador's president is directly elected for a five-year term. In 2019, Nayib Bukele won the presidential election in the first round with 53 percent of the vote and was inaugurated that June. Voter turnout was 52 percent. Organization of American States (OAS) observers called the election free and generally fair and praised the peaceful transfer of power.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The 84-member, unicameral Legislative Assembly is elected for three years. The Nationalist Republican Alliance (ARENA) and Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN) dominated Salvadoran politics since the first postwar election in 1994. However, in the February 2021 legislative elections, ARENA was reduced to 14 seats and the FMLN to 4, while the newly constituted party of President Bukele, New Ideas (NI), won a supermajority with 56 seats. The remaining 10 seats went to smaller parties.

European Union (EU) and Latin American election observers attested that the results reflected the popular will but found that the campaign environment was flawed in favor of NI, with violations of electoral law including the use of significant state resources to favor the party.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

El Salvador's electoral framework is designed by the Legislative Assembly and administered by the Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE).

In September 2021, the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice (CSJ), dominated by unconstitutionally appointed magistrates allied with Bukele, ruled that the president may serve two consecutive terms, in contravention of several articles of the constitution. The Constitutional Chamber directed the TSE to allow the change, which the TSE did, saying that the ruling could not be appealed. In September 2022, President Bukele announced he would run for reelection in 2024.

In March 2022, the FMLN-nominated TSE magistrate Julio Olivo claimed that a group of four government-aligned magistrates had effectively taken control of decision-making processes within the institution, excluding the other six members.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

Salvadorans have traditionally been free to organize in different political parties or groupings. However, in 2021, politically motivated corruption charges resulted in raids on opposition party offices, and figures from ARENA and FMLN were arrested or had arrest warrants issued against them. Meanwhile, the Legislative Assembly set up commissions to investigate past bonus payments to politicians and public funding of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) during the year. While these actions were all ostensibly linked to fighting alleged corruption, opposition parties, human rights groups, and other critics denounced them as political persecution and attempts to silence the opposition.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties are legally able to increase support and gain power through elections. However, President Bukele's election marked a break in the executive dominance of ARENA and the FMLN, and both parties imploded in the 2021 legislative and municipal elections, when new parties gained representation. President Bukele's NI won 56 seats and 152 out of 262 mayors. Opposition parties Our Time (NT) and Vamos both secured one lawmaker and Vamos one mayor. FMLN and ARENA experience extreme pressure from the government and are seemingly incapable of mounting any viable electoral alternative for the presidential, legislative, and municipal elections scheduled for February and March 2024.

NI has also used state resources, including illegal surveillance technology, to undermine opposition members.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Gangs have threatened political candidates and elected officials, but their influence drastically diminished under the state of exception that began in March 2022.

Top-level politicians from all major parties have at different times been accused of links to organized crime. Journalists have regularly uncovered evidence of covert engagement between the Bukele government and gang leaders, chiefly to rein in gang-related crimes—especially homicides—in exchange for various concessions. A criminal investigation into the government's negotiations was shut down after the government-controlled legislature replaced the attorney general.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

All citizens have full political rights and electoral opportunities under the law, regardless of gender, ethnicity, religion, or sexual orientation, but women and minority groups are underrepresented in the legislature and in high-level government positions. A 2013 statute requires that 30 percent of legislative and municipal candidates be women, but the proportion of women in the Legislative Assembly dipped under this threshold following the 2021 elections, and only 11 percent of mayors are women. Furthermore, women's, LGBT+, and Indigenous peoples' interests are poorly represented in practice.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12 (−1)

The Bukele administration repeatedly interfered with the legislature's ability to determine policy until it gained a supermajority in the legislative session that commenced in May 2021, which enabled it to swiftly rubberstamp new laws and policies. The NI government has routinely denied opposition legislators access to key information, including draft legislation, inhibiting substantial deliberation of proposed laws. The government also makes record use of legislative process waivers, which expedites proposals for a vote within hours of submission to the legislature. Bukele has also harassed and bullied allied lawmakers from other parties who criticize NI policies or officials.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4 (−1)

Corruption including embezzlement, money laundering, and other forms of self-enrichment remains a problem in government, and anticorruption bodies and prosecutions are increasingly susceptible to politicization.

In November 2020, prosecutors launched a criminal investigation into the suspected misuse of COVID-19-related funds, including the awarding of public contracts to businesses linked to politicians. However, in May 2021, the NI-controlled legislature passed a law retroactively granting public officials and contractors immunity from any civil or criminal liability stemming from pandemic-related state expenditures. Since then, more cases of suspected graft involving COVID-related funds have emerged.

In 2021, the government shut down the International Commission against Impunity in El Salvador (CICIES), an OAS-supported anticorruption agency that assisted Salvadoran prosecutors.

Under the guise of the state of exception that began in March 2022, the NI government removed legal administrative regulations on the use of public funds and state contracts. Further, authorities restricted the right to access public information, impeding civil society's ability to expose corrupt actors, and passed a law that enables authority to manage public funds without adhering to the relevant law.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because elected authorities suspended anticorruption laws that allowed scrutiny of government spending and contracts.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The 2011 Access to Public Information Law instituted strong mechanisms for transparency and oversight of public institutions. While there have always been issues with compliance, government bodies have been more resistant and less transparent since the beginning of the Bukele administration. Bukele has issued executive decrees impinging on the independence of the oversight and enforcement body, the Access to Public Information Agency (IAIP), and has named partisan commissioners.

Government officials continue to withhold information on expenditures, even amid widespread allegations and indications of related corruption. No government minister has submitted their asset disclosures, as required by law to detect potential corruption.

NI has used its parliamentary supermajority to routinely pass laws with minimal information provided to opposition lawmakers, much less the public. Government plans are generally withheld from public access.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 31 / 60 (−2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 11 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Despite a vibrant media space and constitutional protections, journalists have reported self-censoring in the face of harassment and violence in response to critical coverage of corruption and public policy. Access to the internet is not restricted, and online outlets are critical sources of independent reporting. However, most Salvadorans rely on social media and privately owned television and radio networks for news, and ownership in the broadcast sector is highly concentrated. Fake news and disinformation campaigns are widespread and fomented by key government officials, including through surrogate online media outlets.

A January 2022 report published by multiple human rights and research groups found that at least 35 Salvadoran journalists had been targeted with Pegasus spyware in 2020 and 2021, allegedly by the Salvadoran government, although the researchers could not definitively prove this. In February 2021 and July 2022, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) granted protection measures to dozens of journalists in the country, many of whom had owned devices that were compromised by Pegasus surveillance. In April 2022, the government passed a law threatening journalists who convey messages from gangs with 10 to 15 years in prison, and in August the Association of Journalists of El Salvador reported that nine Salvadoran journalists were living in exile due to government harassment.

Religious freedom is widely respected by state and nonstate actors. For several years, people in some communities have been unable to access their churches due to territorial disputes between gangs. Some religious leaders working with former gang members face harassment by gangs and police and the threat of violence. However, the mass arrests of people suspected of gang affiliation that began in March 2022 improved perceptions of security, and more individuals have attended religious services safely.

Score Change: The score increased from 3 to 4 because the government's severe crackdown on gang activity has resulted in a decline in violent territorial disputes between gangs, allowing people to more freely attend religious services.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is respected, and the educational system is generally free from extensive political indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4 (−1)

While private discussion and personal expression are generally free, the prevalence of gang activity has led many Salvadorans to curtail speech about criminal activity and other sensitive topics outside of their homes. The government has used illegal surveillance mechanisms as part of its crackdown on gang activity that began in March 2022. In February 2022, reforms to the criminal code permitted "necessary undercover digital operations" to investigate alleged crimes without a court order. In May, the government and legislature massively boosted the Prosecutor General of the Republic's wiretap budget and in September removed legal restrictions on wiretapping.

On multiple occasions, authorities used these legal changes, which were allegedly passed to crack down on gang-related activity, to arrest private individuals who critiqued government figures or policy. In August, Luis Rivas was arrested and charged with contempt of the president for anonymously posting on Twitter stating that members of President Bukele's family were at the beach with a large number of bodyguards. In early September, Rivas was released on bail for $10,000, but immediately rearrested on new, undisclosed charges. Days earlier, police briefly and arbitrarily arrested citizen Mario Gómez after he criticized the Bukele government's implementation of Bitcoin as legal tender online. Two weeks later, another six people were arrested for criticizing government officials on social media.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to increasing state surveillance and the arrests of government critics under the guise of the ongoing crackdown on gang activity.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12 (−1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally upheld, and public protests and gatherings are permitted. However, the Bukele government has surveilled activists who organize such events, pushing some citizens to refrain from participating due to fear of potential repercussions. The 2022 state of exception has also limited freedom of assembly rights.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4 (−1)

NGOs have operated freely and played an important role in society and policymaking in the postwar era. However, they have largely been excluded from engagement with policymakers under the Bukele government and are frequently lambasted by the president and other officials over critical stances toward government policy.

In 2021, the Legislative Assembly set up a special commission to investigate NGOs, police and prosecutors raided the offices of seven NGOs on charges of embezzlement, and the government put forward a Foreign Agents Law requiring individuals and organizations to register as foreign agents if their activities "respond to the interests of, or are directly or indirectly funded by, a foreigner" and pay a 40 percent tax on foreign payments. Ruling-party legislators and government officials explicitly linked the law to funding given to investigative journalism that is critical of the government and recent protest marches. In the face of massive pressure, not least by the diplomatic corps and foreign donors, the government delayed voting on the law.

The government targeted several nongovernmental human rights organizations using Pegasus spyware in 2020 and 2021, according to a January 2022 report. Under the state of exception implemented in March 2022, authorities have clamped down on programs to support rehabilitation and reintegration of formerly incarcerated persons.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because the government has investigated NGOs on dubious charges, surveilled activists and civil society groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Labor unions have long faced obstacles in a legal environment that favors business interests, including by mandating only light penalties for employers who interfere with strikes. The law prohibits strikes in sectors deemed essential, and the designation is vaguely defined.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16 (−2)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4 (−1)

Judicial independence has long been under pressure, and the judicial system is hampered by corruption. Elected officials do not always observe judicial rulings and powerful individuals can evade justice by exerting pressure on the judiciary.

The Bukele administration repeatedly defied court orders related to its COVID-19 response during 2020. In the first session of the new legislature in May 2021, the government-aligned legislators removed all members of the CSJ's Constitutional Chamber, as well as the prosecutor general. Though the Constitutional Chamber immediately ruled that these actions were unconstitutional and a violation of judicial independence, the legislature went forward naming new members of the Constitutional Chamber and a new attorney general. In the next days, the ousted judges submitted their resignations, allegedly under duress, amid reports that the homes of some of deposed magistrates were being monitored by the police.

In August 2021, President Bukele announced a "purge" of the judiciary, and the legislature days later passed measures to dismiss judges and prosecutors over 60 years old or who had more than 30 years of service, impacting one in three judges and numerous prosecutors. The reforms also changed the mechanism for appointing and reassigning judges to a seemingly arbitrary process, which was condemned by the UN Special Rapporteur on the Independence of Judges and Lawyers.

The government unconstitutionally instituted a state of exception in March 2022, and extended it on multiple occasions with parliamentary rubber-stamps. Yet the CSJ has failed to deliberate on the legality of the ongoing state of exception, resolve more than 1,300 petitions for habeas corpus, or address thousands of human rights violations linked to the near 60,000 arrests that authorities have carried out. Criminal courts have broadly failed to act independently from government pressure and defiant judges have been removed.

The Bukele administration continues to resist calls to cooperate in the ongoing El Mozote trial, in which 17 high-ranking military officers stand accused of massacring nearly 1,000 people in the northeastern town of El Mozote in 1981.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because a generally pliant judiciary failed to address an unconstitutional state of exception and the accompanying mass arbitrary arrests that characterize the government's gang crackdown, and because the government has continued to remove any judges who challenge its policies.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4 (−1)

Since the end of the war in 1992, due process rights are constitutionally guaranteed but systematically violated. Human rights advocates report that police routinely carry out arbitrary arrests and fabricate and plant evidence, and defendants have long been provided inadequate access to effective legal counsel.

These long-standing challenges escalated sharply in March 2022, when the government instituted an indefinite state of exception, which led to the arbitrary arrests of over 60,000 people suspected of gang activity. Authorities suspended constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly and association, eliminated various rights of people accused of crimes, and routinely violated citizens' privacy by allowing law enforcement to access and surveil individuals' communications without a court order. Criminal courts have remanded virtually all detainees to indefinite custody, without individual scrutiny or respect for due process.

Furthermore, the government passed amendments in March 2022 to the criminal code to increase the maximum punishment for being a gang leader to 45 years' imprisonment and for being a gang member to 30 years' imprisonment. The criminal procedural code was also amended to mandate pretrial detention for charges of gang membership, homicide, and extortion, and to remove the limit on the duration of pretrial detention in these cases, effectively establishing unlimited incarceration without a conviction. The same loss of rights largely applies to minors.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the government's gang crackdown has featured the suspension of constitutional rights and the arbitrary arrest and incarceration of more than 60,000 individuals.

Crime and violence, much of which has long been linked to gangs, remain grave problems. Yet, homicides have declined sharply since mid-2019 under alleged secret agreements and negotiations between the Bukele government and the country's gangs, which the president denies. Reportedly, agreements broke down in March 2022, after which the government immediately implemented a state of exception that has kept homicide rates under control: government statistics claim a 50 percent drop in the murder rate for 2022.

Under the state of exception, the number of incarcerated persons has more than doubled, leading to acute overcrowding with wholly insufficient infrastructure and resources to guarantee basic rights, including food, water, and healthcare. People imprisoned are not allowed family visits and have limited access to lawyers.

Civilians in El Salvador are vulnerable to forced disappearances. The University Observatory of Human Rights (OUDH) reported that between January 2020 and June 2022, there were 4,060 forced disappearances, while police figures for that period claim 692 people disappeared. Relatives of the disappeared often fear reprisals for discussing their cases publicly.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Men and women are granted equal rights under the law, but women are often subject to discrimination. Indigenous people disproportionately face poverty, unemployment, and labor discrimination. Certain other populations, particularly internally displaced persons and LGBT+ people, also have inadequate access to the justice system. Discrimination based on sexual orientation is prevalent, and LGBT+ people are often the targets of hate crimes and violence, including by state security agents.

The government restricted the rights of asylum seekers by signing an agreement with the United States in 2019, whereby El Salvador would accept asylum seekers trying to reach the United States and stop them from traveling north.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16 (+1)

Freedom of movement within El Salvador has long been complicated by gang activity. People living in the turf of one gang may suffer threats or violence when entering the turf of another gang, making it dangerous to travel, work, and attend school, especially for young men. Internal displacement due to gang-related crime and violence is commonplace. However, the degree of gang territorial control dropped sharply after the government implemented a state of exception in March 2022. Conversely, certain population groups—and especially young men—limit their movements due to fear of police harassment or arbitrary arrest.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the government's severe crackdown on gang violence has improved individuals' ability to travel safely.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The rights to property and to start and run a business enjoy legal and regulatory protections. Since the mid-2000s, many businesses and citizens have been subject to extortion, chiefly by gangs. However, the state of exception in effect since March 2022 vastly reduced the prevalence of extortion and gangs' broader impact on the operating environment of businesses.

Political favoritism, cronyism, and bribes affect the awarding of state contracts.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Men and women have equal legal rights on matters such as marriage and divorce, and there are few formal restrictions on such decisions. However, same-sex marriage and adoption remain illegal in El Salvador. Abortion is punishable by imprisonment, including in cases where the pregnant person's life is at risk. Some women have been jailed despite credible claims that their pregnancies ended due to miscarriage.

The prevalence of adolescent pregnancy is a serious problem, accounting for approximately a third of all pregnancies, and many are the result of sexual assault. Female students with children often leave school, sometimes under pressure from their principals. Gender-based violence, including domestic violence, sexual violence, and femicide, is also common. El Salvador has one of Latin America's highest femicide rates.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

El Salvador remains a source, transit, and destination country for the trafficking of women, children, and LGBT+ people. There are instances of forced labor in the construction and informal sectors. According to the 2022 edition of the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report, there has been an increase in convictions of traffickers and 2019 legislation granted temporary residency rights to trafficking survivors, although none received "residency benefits" during the reporting period. However, the government reduced resources allocated for the antitrafficking prosecution team, and shelter and public services for survivors remain insufficient.

Children are vulnerable to economic exploitation, and child labor is a serious problem. Children perform dangerous jobs in agriculture and are recruited by gangs and other criminal elements to carry out illegal activities.

Equatorial Guinea

Population: 1,700,000
Capital: Malabo
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Equatorial Guinea holds regular elections, but the voting is neither free nor fair. The current president, who took power in a military coup that deposed his uncle, has led a highly repressive authoritarian regime since 1979. Oil wealth and political power are concentrated in the hands of the president's family. The government frequently detains the few opposition politicians in the country, cracks down on civil society groups, and censors journalists. The judiciary is under presidential control, and security forces engage in torture and other violence with impunity.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In May, Vice President Teodoro Nguema Obiang Mangue, a son of the president who is widely known as Teodorín, launched a campaign aimed at combating gang violence. Authorities detained thousands of people over the course of several months, and at least four died in custody.

- In September, Gabriel Nsé Obiang, leader of the banned opposition party Citizens for Innovation (CI), was arrested along with as many as 275 party members in a police assault on the party's headquarters that caused the deaths of one officer and at least four opposition activists.
- In tightly controlled general elections in November, President Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo won a sixth term in office, and the ruling party's electoral bloc captured all of the parliamentary and municipal council seats at stake.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 0 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president controls the executive branch, including the council of ministers. Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, Africa's longest-serving head of state, has held the presidency since 1979. He was awarded a new seven-year term in the November 2022 presidential election, ostensibly winning 97 percent of the vote in an unfair contest against two nominal challengers from approved opposition parties.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The bicameral parliament consists of a 70-seat Senate and a 100-seat Chamber of Deputies. Fifteen senators are appointed by the president, 55 are directly elected, and there can be several additional ex officio members. The Chamber of Deputies is directly elected, and all elected lawmakers serve five-year terms.

In the November 2022 legislative elections, the ruling Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea (PDGE) and its allies won all 100 seats in the lower house, all 55 of the elected seats in the Senate, and all 588 municipal council positions. The two opposition parties that were permitted to participate received a tiny fraction of the vote, according to official results, and the campaign environment was tightly controlled by the authorities.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

Equatorial Guinea does not have an independent electoral body; the head of the National Electoral Commission during the 2022 elections was also the country's interior minister and a member of the ruling PDGE. Elections are not fairly managed in practice.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

The PDGE is the dominant party, operating in conjunction with several subordinate parties in its coalition. The only other parties allowed to participate in the 2022 elections were the Convergence for Social Democracy (CPDS) and the Party of the Social Democratic Coalition (PCSD).

Opposition leaders and members are subject to arrest, abuse in detention, and heavy prison sentences after unfair trials. In September 2022, police attacked the headquarters of CI, an opposition party that was banned in 2018, and arrested as many as 275 people, including party leader Gabriel Nsé Obiang. One officer and at least four civilians were reportedly killed in the assault, and many others were injured.

Equatorial Guinea has never experienced a peaceful transfer of power through elections. President Obiang took power after a coup in 1979, and in 2016 he appointed his son as vice president, paving the way for his succession.

The November 2022 elections featured extensive irregularities and no genuine competition. Opposition candidates lost every contest at the presidential, legislative, and municipal levels.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The regime routinely uses the security forces to attack and intimidate opposition supporters, and political loyalty to the ruling party is treated as a condition for obtaining and keeping public-sector employment.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The ethnic Fang majority dominates political life, leaving minority ethnic groups with little influence; power is concentrated in the hands of the president's family and allies from their region of origin. Women formally enjoy equal political rights, but the repressive political system does not allow them to organize independently to advance their interests. Women hold few government positions, 31 percent of the seats in the Chamber of Deputies, and 22 percent of the seats in the Senate. While no law explicitly prevents LGBT+ individuals from exercising their political rights, societal discrimination discourages them from participating openly and advocating for their welfare.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The executive branch—headed by the president, who is not freely elected—sets and implements government policy, leaving the legislature no meaningful role in the policymaking process.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

There are no independent anticorruption mechanisms, and the government is marred by nepotism and graft. Hiring and promotions within the government, army, and civil service favor those with ties to the president and his family. Two of the president's sons, the vice president and the minister of mines and hydrocarbons, have been the subjects of corruption cases in European courts. Although the government has taken some steps to address corruption, the efforts have been largely superficial.

In March 2022, the president appointed the first members of the Court of Auditors, a monitoring body called for in a 2012 constitutional amendment. Former treasury minister Melchor Esono Edjo, a nephew of the president, was sworn in as head of the court despite past international corruption allegations and a conflict of interest related to his shares in a partially state-owned bank. In May, the president also appointed the leaders of a new anticorruption commission in keeping with a 2020 law. The effectiveness of these institutions and the differentiation of their functions remained unclear at year's end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government's budget process and procurement system are opaque, as are the finances of state-owned companies. A significant percentage of revenue from the country's oil reserves is funneled to Obiang's allies through noncompetitive, nontransparent construction contracts. International financial organizations and human rights groups have criticized the government for pouring resources into wasteful infrastructure projects while neglecting public health and social spending.

In compliance with a 2021 anticorruption law, the government released a form for asset declarations in March 2022. Members of the government issued their respective declarations later that year, but the statements were apparently removed from the government website a few weeks later.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 5 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Press freedom is severely limited, despite constitutional protections. Most journalists consistently exercise self-censorship, and those who do criticize the regime are subject to dismissal and other reprisals. The country's only private television and radio broadcaster, RTV-Asonga, is controlled by Teodorín. The handful of private newspapers and magazines in operation face intense financial and political pressure and are unable to publish regularly. The government has long sought to block access to the websites of opposition parties and exile groups, and online versions of some Spanish newspapers are regularly blocked. The government has obstructed access to the internet in times of political tension.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Religious freedom is protected by the constitution, though in practice it is sometimes affected by the country's broader political repression and endemic corruption. The Roman Catholic Church is the dominant faith and is exempt from registration and permit requirements that apply to other groups. Government officials are regularly required to attend Catholic masses.

In 2020, the government disbanded two religious groups on the grounds that they did not comply with COVID-19-related restrictions. The decree took effect without due process and included deportation orders for foreign pastors associated with the groups.

In August 2022, pastor Rubén Mayé Nsue Mangue, a former minister of justice and ambassador to the United States, was arrested and banned from practicing his religion after he allegedly criticized the government in sermons and on social media. He was forcibly disappeared for days after his arrest and remained in detention at year's end.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is politically constrained, and self-censorship among faculty is common. Some university professors and teachers have reportedly been hired or dismissed due to their political affiliations.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4

Freedoms of personal expression and private discussion are restricted. The government uses informants and electronic surveillance to monitor dissent, and critics of the government are subject to arbitrary arrest, physical abuse, and trumped-up criminal charges.

In September 2022, ahead of the general elections in November, several alleged opponents of the government were arrested based in part on their social media activity and private communications. At least three detainees were accused of plotting a terrorist action and shown confessing on state television.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is severely restricted. Opposition gatherings are typically blocked or dispersed by security forces, and citizens are sometimes pressured to attend progovernment events.

In June 2022, a rally organized by the CPDS was banned by the authorities. In September, Leoncio Prisco Eko Mba, a rapper also known as Adjoguening who had criticized the government in his lyrics, was arrested while staging a protest to demand that officials restore his confiscated passport. He was held for a month without charges.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 0 / 4

All associations must register with the government through an onerous process, and independent nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) face state persecution. In 2019, the Center for Studies and Initiatives for the Development of Equatorial Guinea (CEID-GE) was dissolved by government decree.

Among those arrested in the broader preelection crackdown in September 2022 were human rights activists Luis Nzó Ondo and Anacleto Micha Nlang. Another civil society activist, Joaquin Elo Ayeto, was arrested in December.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

The constitution provides for the right to organize unions, but there are many legal and practical barriers to union formation, collective bargaining, and strikes. The government has refused to register several trade unions; a farmers' organization is the only legal union.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is not independent, and judges in sensitive cases often consult with the office of the president before issuing important rulings. Under the constitution, the president is the nation's first magistrate. He also oversees the body that nominates judges. The court system's impartiality is further undermined by corruption. Judges are regularly accused of taking bribes.

In July 2022, the president of the Supreme Court resigned in the face of allegations that he had received a bribe from a private company. Teodorín stated on social media that the judge had admitted to the crime. A new Supreme Court president was appointed by decree later that month.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Security forces routinely detain people without charge, and defendants' due process rights are not respected. Military courts, which are empowered to try civilians for certain crimes, have even fewer due process protections than civilian courts and lack an avenue for appeal.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Beatings, torture, and forced disappearances by security forces are reportedly common. Prisons are overcrowded and feature harsh conditions, including physical abuse, poor sanitation, and denial of medical care.

In May 2022, Teodorín launched a law enforcement campaign to suppress violence by criminal gangs. Authorities detained thousands of people over the course of several months, and at least four died in custody.

A revised penal code that was enacted in September eliminated the death penalty, though capital punishment is still allowed under the code of military justice. The most recent execution was carried out in 2014.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

There are few legal protections against discrimination. Women face discrimination in employment and other matters, particularly in rural areas. Ethnic minority groups such as the Bubi, Ndowe, and Annobonese suffer persistent societal discrimination in the form of harassment from law enforcement officials or difficulties accessing public services.

Immigrants, including irregular migrants, are subject to raids, physical abuse, and extortion by police. Same-sex sexual activity is not illegal, but LGBT+ people face social stigma and mistreatment including street harassment and discrimination in the workplace.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement is protected by law but restricted in practice through measures such as police checkpoints, which often require the payment of bribes. Authorities have denied opposition members and other dissidents' return from abroad, confiscated their passports, or restricted their movements within the country.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Pervasive corruption and onerous bureaucratic procedures serve as major impediments to private business activity. Property rights are inconsistently respected by the government. Members of the Bubi minority have reported cases of land grabs by elites and the government in recent years.

Most women face disadvantages regarding inheritance and property rights under both the civil code and customary practices, though women enjoy greater customary rights among the Bubi.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

The civil code and customary law put women at a disadvantage with respect to personal status matters like marriage and child custody, with some exceptions among the Bubi. Laws against rape and domestic violence are not enforced effectively. The government does little to collect data or to support civil society efforts to combat such problems, which include sexual violence against minors and LGBT+ people. Child marriage is common; the minimum age for marriage is 14. The Education Ministry bars pregnant girls from attending school.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

The country's oil wealth is concentrated among the ruling elite, leaving much of the population without access to basic services. Equatorial Guinea continues to score poorly on social and economic development indicators, and economic conditions have worsened when global oil prices are low.

Some foreign workers are subject to passport confiscation and forced labor. Corrupt officials are often complicit in human trafficking, according to the US State Department. In late 2021, security forces arrested hundreds of foreign nationals—particularly those from other African countries—regardless of their documentation or legal status. Some were expelled from the country without the required court procedure.

Eritrea

Population: 3,700,000
Capital: Asmara
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Eritrea is a militarized authoritarian state that has not held a national election since independence from Ethiopia in 1993. The People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), headed by President Isaias Afwerki, is the sole political party. Arbitrary detention is commonplace, and citizens are required to perform national service, often for their entire working lives. The government shut down all independent media in 2001.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Eritrea continued to send military to support the Ethiopian government's campaign against the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF), an armed group in the Tigray region. Eritrean forces were accused of committing human rights abuses during their deployment in Ethiopia, including the forcible repatriation of Eritrean refugees, killings, and rape.
- In September, Eritrean authorities began a nationwide forced conscription campaign in order to send more troops to Tigray. The mobilization campaign intensified in October, when security forces violently tracked down those who attempted to escape being drafted. Reports emerged that authorities had begun to coerce individuals in hiding by detaining their family members.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Following Eritrea's formal independence from Ethiopia in 1993, an unelected Transitional National Assembly chose Isaias Afwerki to serve as president until elections could be held under a new constitution. He has remained in office since then, without ever obtaining a mandate from voters.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

A constitution ratified in 1997, but never instituted, calls for an elected 150-seat National Assembly, which would choose the president from among its members by a majority vote. National elections have been postponed indefinitely, and the transitional assembly has not met since 2002. National elections have never been conducted. Periodic local and regional assembly elections are carefully orchestrated by the PFDJ and offer no meaningful choice to voters.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The 1997 constitution calls for an electoral commission whose head is appointed by the president and confirmed by the National Assembly, but it has never been established. Electoral laws have not been finalized.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

The PFDJ is the only legally recognized political party in Eritrea. Alternative groups must operate from abroad among the diaspora. Groups were hosted in Ethiopia in the past, but its government ordered many of them to cease operations after the two countries sought rapprochement in 2018.

The Eritrean government holds prominent dissidents and family members in detention; a group of 11 individuals has reportedly been held incommunicado since 2001. In September 2021, Amnesty International noted that nine may have died in detention. In addition, Ciham Ali Abdu, the daughter of former information minister Ali Abdu Ahmed, was detained in 2012 when she tried to flee to Sudan. Former finance minister Berhane Abrehe, meanwhile, was detained in 2018. Ciham and Berhane remained in custody in 2022.

President Isaias and the PFDJ have been in power without interruption since independence. Since multiparty elections have never been allowed, opposition groups have had no opportunity to compete or enter government.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Eritrean society is dominated by the military, with most citizens required to perform open-ended military or other national service. The authorities' intolerance of dissent and the absence of elections or opposition parties leave individuals with no political options other than loyalty to the PFDJ, imprisonment, or illegal emigration through often dangerous routes.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Women and various ethnic groups are nominally represented within the PFDJ but have no practical ability to organize independently or advocate for their interests through the political system.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Power is concentrated in the hands of the unelected president, who reportedly determines policy with the help of an informal circle of advisers, leaving the cabinet and security officials to merely carry out his decisions. The United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) has noted that military personnel were overrepresented among the president's closest associates.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Petty bribery and influence peddling are thought to be endemic, and larger-scale corruption is a problem among some party officials and military leaders. Senior military officials have allegedly profited from smuggling Eritreans out of the country. There are no independent agencies or mechanisms in place to prevent or punish corruption. Special anticorruption courts overseen by the military nominally exist but are mostly inactive.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government operates without public scrutiny. Basic data about the state budget and its appropriations are not publicly disclosed, and officials are not required to disclose their assets.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 2 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 1 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The government shut down all independent media outlets in 2001. Several outlets provide coverage to Eritreans from outside the country, including the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), Paris-based Radio Erena, and satellite station Asena TV. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), 16 journalists remain imprisoned as of 2022 for their work in Eritrea.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

The government places strict limits on the exercise of religion. Eritrea officially recognizes only four faiths: Sunni Islam, Orthodox Christianity, Roman Catholicism, and Evangelical Lutheranism. Religious practice is prohibited among members of the military.

Asmara interferes in the practice of recognized faiths. The patriarch of the Eritrean Orthodox Church (EOC), Abune Antonios, was deposed in 2006 and expelled from the EOC for "heresy" in 2019. He remained under house arrest until his death in February 2022. In May 2021, Asmara announced the election of Abune Qerlos as patriarch. Qerlos died in December 2022 and had not been replaced before the end of the year.

Followers of other denominations are subject to arrest, imprisonment, and the loss of property. Jehovah's Witnesses face severe persecution, including detention and denial of citizenship.

Although the government had released several religious prisoners in 2020 and 2021, in October 2022, authorities arrested a Catholic bishop and two priests for unknown reasons; church officials were not informed of bishop and priests' whereabouts. Church officials have routinely criticized the Eritrean government's involvement in the conflict in Tigray, as well as the government's antidemocratic behavior. The bishop and one of the priests were released in December.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4

Academic freedom is greatly constrained. Students in their last year of secondary school must perform military service at the Sawa military training center. In 2019, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that widespread physical and sexual abuse took place at Sawa.

In August 2022, Eritrean authorities took over the Hagaz Agricultural and Technical Boarding School, a Catholic-run institution; another Catholic-run technical school was set to be taken over by the government in September.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4

Freedoms of expression and private discussion are severely inhibited by fear of government informants and the likelihood of arrest and arbitrary detention for any airing of dissent. The authorities regularly block access to social media platforms and shutter internet cafés.

Members of the Eritrean diaspora are, by comparison, better able to express dissent online. However, members of the diaspora are also subject to government surveillance and harassment.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is not recognized by the authorities. Public gatherings of more than seven people require a permit. Those who protest face the threat of deadly force at the hands of state security officers or arbitrary detention.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 0 / 4

The law requires all nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to undergo an onerous and arbitrary annual registration process and limits their activities to providing humanitarian relief. In reality, there are no independent NGOs based in Eritrea. The government continues to deny permission for external human rights organizations to enter the country.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

While the Eritrean government has ratified the International Labour Organization's eight fundamental conventions, no independent trade unions function in Eritrea. The only union umbrella group, the National Confederation of Eritrean Workers, is affiliated with the PFDJ. According to reports to the UNHRC, the government has prevented new unions from being formed.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary has no independence from the executive branch. The Supreme Court called for in the constitution has never been established, nor has a Judicial Commission tasked with appointing judges. The president controls the appointment and dismissal of all judges; even nominally elected judges in local community courts are controlled by the Justice Ministry, according to UN investigators. Many judges are military officers.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Basic principles of due process are systematically violated. Arbitrary arrests and detentions are common; targets include those who evade military service, try to flee the country, or are suspected of practicing an unauthorized religion. Eritreans who offend high-ranking government or party officials are also reportedly subject to arbitrary arrest.

Prisoners, including children, former members of the government, and their family members, are routinely held incommunicado for indefinite periods without charge or trial, with the authorities refusing even to inform family members whether they are still alive. There is no operational system of public defense lawyers. Thousands of political prisoners and prisoners of conscience remain imprisoned.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

UN investigators have described the routine and systematic use of physical and psychological torture in both civilian and military detention centers. Deaths in custody or in military service due to torture and other harsh conditions have been reported, though authorities do not investigate such incidents. Security forces employ lethal violence arbitrarily and with impunity. Individuals attempting to escape military service or flee the country have been fired on by soldiers.

Eritrean forces continued to operate in Ethiopia in support of Addis Ababa's military campaign against the TPLF during the year. In March 2021, Human Rights Concern–Eritrea reported that boys were being pressed into military service and sent to the Tigray region of Ethiopia.

Eritrean forces engaged in violence against civilians during their deployment. In 2022, Eritrean forces continued to occupy parts of Tigray with atrocities committed by Eritrean groups consistently documented by different rights groups. In September 2022, Eritrean authorities began a nationwide forced conscription campaign, in order to send more troops to Tigray. The mobilization campaign intensified in October, when security forces violently tracked down those who attempted to escape being drafted. Reports emerged that family members of individuals who were in hiding had been detained to coerce them out of hiding.

There are allegations that two of Eritrea's nine recognized ethnic groups, the Kunama and Afar, face severe discrimination, including exclusion from the government's poverty alleviation programs.

Laws mandate equal educational opportunity for women and equal pay for equal work. However, traditional societal discrimination against women persists in the countryside, and the deeply flawed legal system does not effectively uphold their formal rights.

Same-sex relations are criminalized, and LGBT+ people enjoy no legal protections from discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 1 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Freedom of movement is heavily restricted. Eritreans young enough for national service are rarely given permission to go abroad, and those who try to travel outside the country without obtaining an exit visa face imprisonment. Individuals also require permits to travel within the country. Eritrean refugees and asylum seekers who are repatriated from other countries are subject to detention under harsh conditions.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 0 / 4

The national conscription system denies much of the working-age population the opportunity to establish and run their own businesses. Both the authorities and private actors with the regime's support can confiscate property and evict occupants without due process.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Men and women have equal rights under laws governing marriage, nationality, and other personal status matters. However, girls in rural areas remain vulnerable to early or forced marriage. Rape of women and sexualized forms of violence against men are common in detention and in military service. Sexual assault of female conscripts is endemic and has not been thoroughly investigated by the authorities.

The government has banned the practice of female genital mutilation (FGM). In 2020, the government formed a steering committee and adopted a national action plan to halt FGM and other forms of gender-based violence. FGM remains widespread in rural areas, though awareness campaigns have contributed to a decline in the practice.

Eritrea's conscription system ties most able-bodied men and women—including those under 18 who are completing secondary school—to obligatory military service, which can also entail compulsory, unpaid labor for enterprises controlled by the political elite. National service is supposed to last 18 months but is open-ended in practice. UN human rights experts have described this system as enslavement.

Estonia

Population: 1,300,000
Capital: Tallinn
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Estonia's democratic institutions are generally strong, and both political rights and civil liberties are widely respected. However, about 5 percent of the population remains stateless and cannot participate in national elections. Corruption is a persistent challenge, as is discrimination against ethnic Russians, Roma, LGBT+ people, and others. Far-right and Eurosceptic forces have become increasingly vocal in Estonian politics in recent years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, the two-party Estonian ruling coalition collapsed, and Prime Minister Kaja Kallas of the center-right Reform Party dismissed all of the Center Party's ministers from the cabinet. A new ruling coalition was formed in July comprising the Reform Party, the conservative Isamaa party, and the center-left Social Democratic Party (SDE).
- Over 115,000 Ukrainian people fleeing the Russia military's full-scale invasion of their country entered Estonia during the year. By year's end, Estonia had accepted more than 62,000 Ukrainian refugees, while others passed through to other European Union (EU) countries in the Schengen Area. In addition, some 300,000 Russian citizens crossed the border, in most cases for the purpose of Schengen transit. Estonian authorities in August legalized migrant pushbacks to be used in "emergencies caused by mass immigration" and in September closed the borders to most Russian citizens.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, who serves as head of government, is nominated by the president and approved by the parliament. There have been three governments since the 2019 parliamentary elections. The first government, from 2019, was headed by Jüri Ratas of the Center Party in coalition with the far-right Conservative People's Party of Estonia (EKRE) and the conservative Isamaa party. It was replaced in January 2021 by a government led by the Reform Party leader Kaja Kallas in coalition with the Center Party. In June 2022, relations between the ruling parties deteriorated, and the coalition crumbled. A new goverment was formed in July, again headed by Kallas of the Reform Party, this time in coalition with Isamaa and the Social Democrats.

The president is elected by the parliament to a five-year term, filling a largely ceremonial role as head of state. In August 2021, Alar Karis was elected as a nonpartisan consensus candidate in a second round of voting, winning the support of all parliamentary parties except the EKRE.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The constitution establishes a 101-seat unicameral parliament called the Riigikogu, whose members are elected for four-year terms using proportional representation in multimember constituencies.

The March 2019 parliamentary elections met democratic standards. As it had been in previous elections in 2015, voter turnout was about 64 percent. Five parties cleared the 5 percent vote threshold for representation, with the main opposition center-right Reform Party capturing a plurality with 34 seats. Electoral support for EKRE more than doubled, which translated into 19 seats. The incumbent Center Party won 26 seats, down one. The number of seats won by Isamaa and the Social Democrats dropped to 12 and 10, respectively.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The legal framework for conducting elections is clear and fairly administered. Online voting is common and has gained in popularity. The 2019 parliamentary and 2021 local elections featured record turnout online, demonstrating strong public confidence in the system.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

Estonia's political parties organize and operate freely, and the political landscape remains open and competitive.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The country has undergone multiple democratic transfers of power between rival parties following elections over the past three decades, and opposition parties have a strong presence in the parliament.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally not subject to undue interference. However, there have been increasing concerns about the influence of online disinformation in recent years, particularly about election campaigns, the COVID-19 pandemic, and the war in Ukraine.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Around 5 percent of the country's population—mostly ethnic Russians—remain stateless and cannot participate in national elections. Resident noncitizens are permitted to vote in local and European Parliament elections but may not run as candidates or join political parties. The authorities have adopted policies to assist those seeking naturalization. Following the Russian government's full-scale invasion of Ukraine, draft legislation was submitted to the parliament to repeal the local-election voting rights of anyone who lacks EU citizenship. The measure, which appeared to be aimed at preventing Russians and Belarussians from electoral participation, was supported by many MPs from both the ruling and opposition parties.

Political representation of women is gradually increasing. Former president Kersti Kaljulaid became the first woman in the country's history to hold her office when she was elected in 2016. Moreover, a record total of 29 women were elected to the 101-seat Riigikogu in 2019. After taking office in 2021, Prime Minister Kallas—the first woman to hold her post—appointed an almost equally gender-balanced cabinet. The principle was upheld in the second Kallas cabinet, named in July 2022, which includes seven women and eight men.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Both the government and the parliament are freely elected and function without interference from external or nonstate actors.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

The legal framework and independent law enforcement institutions provide important checks on corruption, and cases against high-profile defendants have been brought to court in recent years, though the results have been mixed.

There are still no comprehensive rules for the protection of whistleblowers, with proposed legislation stalled as of the end of 2022. The adoption of a bill that would tighten control of party financing is also being delayed. Regulations on lobbying are being strengthened, but implementation of the changes is still in progress.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Estonia is known for its high degree of government transparency and well-developed e-governance services.

Public access to government information and the asset declarations of officials is provided for both in law and in practice. Estonia generally performs well in ensuring a transparent and effective public procurement system, although according to the European Commission's 2021 figures, the latest available, 34 percent of Estonian public contracts that year had only a single bidder or no call for bids at all.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The government generally respects freedom of the press. However, judges sometimes use the criminal procedure code to restrict media coverage in various cases of public interest, particularly those concerning corruption. Public and private television and radio stations broadcast freely, and there are a number of independent newspapers. In February 2022, Estonia amended its media law, increasing the media regulator's independence and requiring greater transparency around media ownership structures.

Observers have noted a trend toward ownership concentration, especially at the regional level. Some local media have struggled amid the COVID-19 pandemic and increasing digitalization in the media market.

The Russian military's full-scale invasion of Ukraine triggered Estonian regulatory institutions to block access to Russian media outlets beginning in February 2022.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is respected in law and in practice.

D3.Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected. However, by law, public Russian-language high schools must teach 60 percent of their curriculum in the Estonian language, and a new education law adopted in December 2022 requires that the country's schools transition gradually to Estonian as the only language of instruction. The timeline set out by the law begins with the 2024–25 school year and ends with the 2032–33 school year. However, there are concerns that shortages of teachers and material resources might interfere with the transition timeline. Following the switch, children from Russian-speaking families will be given the opportunity to learn Russian language and culture in separate classes.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on the freedoms of personal expression and private discussion.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, and the government upholds this right in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

The government upholds freedom of association and does not restrict or control the activities of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs).

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The law recognizes workers' rights to organize, strike, and bargain collectively, although public servants at the municipal and state levels may not strike. While these rights are largely upheld in practice, union membership is low, and employers in some sectors have resisted bargaining efforts.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent and generally free from government or other interference.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Legal processes in civil and criminal matters are generally free and fair. Laws prohibiting arbitrary arrest and detention and ensuring the right to a fair trial are largely observed. Court fees were raised significantly in January 2022, but there are many exemptions built into the fee structures.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

While Estonians generally enjoy physical security, the country's steadily declining intentional homicide rate remains one of the highest in the EU. Prison conditions do not fully meet international standards, and some inmates reportedly have inadequate access to health care. Estonia has a relatively high incarceration rate, with 165 people incarcerated per 100,000 residents in 2021, according to Eurostat data.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The constitution and laws provide broad safeguards against discrimination based on race, gender, language, sexual orientation, and other such categories. However, Russian-speaking residents continue to face societal discrimination, and some statutes lack robust protections against such bias. Gender discrimination is also a problem, particularly in employment, and the gender pay gap is among the highest in the EU, though it has decreased in recent years. Roma face employment discrimination and disparities in educational outcomes.

The rhetoric and ideological beliefs of many active EKRE members have increased the prevalence of hostile and extremist views toward Jewish, Muslim, and LGBT+ people, as well as other marginalized groups. In 2020, the European Commission began infringement proceedings against Estonia for failing to match EU regulations for prosecuting hate crimes and criminalizing hate speech in domestic laws; legislation resolving the discrepancies had not been passed as of the end of 2022.

In August 2022, Estonia legalized the pushback of migrants during "emergencies caused by mass immigration." Although the measures were not applied systematically during the year, not all Ukrainian refugees attempting to cross the eastern border of the country were permitted to enter. In September, along with other Baltic states and Poland, Estonia effectively closed its borders to Russian citizens.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Citizens and residents enjoy free movement inside Estonia, and there are no significant restrictions on international travel. All remaining movement and travel restrictions related to the COVID-19 pandemic were lifted in spring 2022.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The legal and regulatory framework is generally supportive of property rights and entrepreneurship, and residents can freely engage in private business activity in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

While individual freedom on personal status issues such as marriage and divorce is generally upheld, same-sex marriage is not recognized. At the end of 2022, the parliament had yet to adopt necessary amendments for the implementation of a 2014 law permitting same-sex civil unions. In September 2021, the Supreme Court ruled that constitutional protections against state interference in family life apply to same-sex couples that live together just as they do for opposite-sex partners. Gender-based violence, including domestic violence, remains a serious problem.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

There are legal safeguards against exploitative working conditions, and they are generally enforced in practice. The government makes serious and sustained efforts to prosecute those responsible for human trafficking and provide services to victims, though it has encountered difficulties in adequately punishing convicted traffickers and identifying victims, according to the US State Department.

Estonia's unemployment rate, which had reached 8.7 percent by the end of March 2021 due to the effects of the COVID-19 pandemic, fell to 5.2 percent by the end of that year. It then started to rise again, ending 2022 at 5.4 percent. Nearly a fifth of the population remains at risk of poverty or social exclusion.

Eswatini

Population: 1,200,000
Capital: Mbabane (administrative), Lobamba (legislative, royal)
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Eswatini (known internationally as Swaziland until 2018) is a monarchy currently ruled by King Mswati III. The king exercises ultimate authority over all branches of the national government and effectively controls local governance through his influence over traditional chiefs. Political dissent and civic and labor activism are subject to harsh punishment under sedition and other laws. Additional human rights problems include impunity for security forces and discrimination against women and LGBT+ people.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- A special summit of the security organ of the Southern African Development Community (SADC), intended to discuss the political situation in Eswatini following the government's 2021 crackdown on dissent, was scheduled for July, but the talks collapsed days before the planned meeting. Though the Eswatini government stated that the SADC canceled the talks, opposition figures alleged that the government collapsed the talks due to fear of protests.

- The government's crackdown on dissent continued during the year, and security forces continued to respond to prodemocracy protests with violence, often using disproportionate force to disperse demonstrations. Protesters and activists faced arbitrary arrest, and some detainees reported being tortured while in custody.
- In an April ruling, the High Court upheld the government's 2020 decision to deny official registration to an LGBT+ advocacy organization, finding that although the constitution guarantees fundamental rights irrespective of gender or sex, those rights are subject to Eswatini's laws, which do not permit same-sex relations. One judge dissented, saying that the rejection was executed in a "grossly irregular manner."

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The king is the chief executive authority and is empowered to appoint and dismiss the prime minister and members of the cabinet. Mswati III took the throne in 1986, four years after the death of his father, King Sobhuza II.

The prime minister is ostensibly the head of government but has little practical power. Cleopas Sipho Dlamini was appointed prime minister in July 2021, succeeding acting prime minister Themba Masuku, who temporarily held the position after former prime minister Ambrose Mandvulo Dlamini died of COVID-19 in 2020.

Traditional chiefs govern their respective localities and typically report directly to the king. While some chiefs inherit their positions according to custom, others are appointed through royal interventions, as allowed by the constitution.

The 73-member House of Assembly, the lower chamber of the bicameral Parliament, includes 59 members elected by popular vote within the tinkhundla system, which allows local chiefs to vet candidates and influence outcomes in practice; the king appoints 10 members. If female representation does not exceed 30 percent of the lower house, an additional four women may be elected by the body; parliamentarians did so in 2018.

The king appoints 20 members of the 30-seat Senate, the upper chamber, with the remainder selected by the House of Assembly. All members of Parliament serve five-year terms. After the 2018 parliamentary elections, the king appointed six members of the royal family to the House of Assembly and eight to the Senate. The elections, which were tightly controlled and featured a slate of candidates almost entirely loyal to the king, did not offer voters a genuine choice.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The Elections and Boundaries Commission (EBC) is not considered impartial. It is financially and administratively dependent on the executive, and its members are appointed by the king on the advice of the Judicial Service Commission (JSC), whose members are also royal appointees. Details of the results of September 2018 parliamentary elections were only made public in March 2019.

Traditional chiefs also play an important role in elections, as candidates effectively need their approval to run for office.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Election to public office is based on "individual merit," according to the constitution. There is no legal avenue for parties to register and participate in elections, though some political associations exist without legal recognition. Over the years, political parties seeking legal recognition have suffered court defeats.

A number of prodemocracy organizations and trade unions have continued to lobby for political reforms and have publicly challenged Mswati's grip on power, even given the serious risks involved. The government has used increasingly repressive tactics to stifle rising prodemocracy activism in recent years; those calling for political reform often face arbitrary arrest, harassment, and assault at the hands of security forces, who regularly use excessive force. In July 2021, two prodemocracy members of Parliament, Mduduzi Bacede Mabuza and Mthandeni Dube, were arrested on specious terrorism charges amid a government crackdown on political dissent following the widespread antigovernment protests that began that May. Both parliamentarians remained in detention through year-end 2022.

The king has tight control over the political system in law and in practice, leaving no room for the emergence of an organized opposition with the potential to enter government. The vast majority of candidates who contested the 2018 general elections were supporters of the king. Parliamentarians often self-censor in fear of retaliation.

The king called for Sibaya—a meeting of the nation traditionally held once a year—to be held in July 2021, claiming the meeting would serve as a platform for a national dialogue. Nearly all of Eswatini's political opposition rejected the Sibaya, calling the process one-sided. At the meeting, only Mswati, who openly ridiculed calls for democratic reforms, was given the opportunity to speak. Opposition groups were also excluded from discussions between the government and the SADC delegation sent to Eswatini that July to assess the political situation in the country.

A special summit of the SADC's security organ, at which the leaders of South Africa, Namibia, and Botswana were slated to meet with Mswati to discuss the political situation in Eswatini, was scheduled for July 2022, but was postponed days before the planned meeting. While Eswatini's government stated that the SADC unexpectedly canceled the summit—reportedly because Mswati would not attend in person—opposition figures alleged that the government collapsed the talks for fear of opposition protests.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Traditional chiefs, as the king's representatives, wield enormous influence over their subjects. In addition to vetting prospective candidates for office, they have been accused of ordering residents to vote or not vote for certain candidates.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

There are virtually no members of minority groups in the government, as most officials have some connection to the royal family or its broader clan. Women are politically marginalized, with the lower house of Parliament falling well short of a 30 percent gender quota after the 2018 elections. Women hold 40 percent of seats in the Senate, which is not directly elected.

Customary restrictions on widows in mourning—a period that can last from one to three years—effectively bar women from participating in public affairs during that time. LGBT+ people and people with disabilities are also politically marginalized.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The king and his government determine policy and legislation; members of Parliament hold no real power and effectively act as a rubber stamp in approving the king's legislative priorities. Parliament cannot initiate legislation and has little oversight or influence on budgetary matters. The king is also constitutionally empowered to veto any legislation. The absolute authority of the king was demonstrated by his decision to rename the country in 2018 without any constitutional process or parliamentary approval.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is a major problem, and implicated officials generally enjoy impunity. The Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) is perceived to be ineffective, with civil society groups accusing it of pursuing politically motivated cases and serving the interests of the prime minister. The ACC, which reports to the Justice Ministry, lacks adequate financial and human resources and must consult with the minister on hiring. In 2018, a cabinet committee was established to develop a zero-tolerance policy on corruption in government, but its ability to create an effective anticorruption framework remains unclear. The Tibiyo Taka Ngwane (Wealth of the Nation) investment fund, managed by Mswati, has reportedly been used for the king's personal gain, with opposition figures accusing him of using it to bolster his personal income as far back as 2011.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Eswatini lacks access-to-information laws, and there is no culture of proactive disclosure of government information. Public requests for information are largely ignored in practice, and the budgeting process lacks transparency. The authorities tightly restrict access to data on spending by the royal family and the security forces. Transparency was further reduced by the Public Service Act, passed in 2018, which broadly prevents officials from providing public information to the media unless given express permission by the secretary of the cabinet.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 16 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 5 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

A variety of laws, including the Sedition and Subversive Activities Act (SSAA) and defamation laws, can be used to restrict media coverage by criminalizing publications that are alleged to be seditious, as well as the use of words that are alleged to be seditious, for example, those that "may excite disaffection" against the king. Journalists often face harassment, assault, and intimidation, and self-censorship is reportedly common. The state broadcaster is tightly controlled by the government, and the Swazi Observer, a major newspaper, is effectively owned by the king.

Journalists have faced questioning, detention, or other forms of scrutiny for their reporting or their own political activity in recent years. Numerous journalists fled the country in 2020 after being detained and physically assaulted by police for their work. In 2021, two South African journalists covering antigovernment protests were arrested and reportedly tortured by Eswatini security forces. In July 2022, the prime minister declared journalist Zweli Martin Dlamini and his online publication Swaziland News to be "terrorist entities"; Dlamini, whose reporting focused on antigovernment protests and prodemocracy movements in Eswatini, called the decision an attempt to suppress the voice of the people.

In response to the use of social media to promote the widespread protests that took place throughout the year, the government twice blocked internet access in the country in 2021. That June, the Eswatini Communications Commission (ESCCOM) ordered a countrywide internet shutdown that lasted more than a week. A second internet blackout was briefly imposed that October.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees religious freedom and bars discrimination based on religion. Rules requiring registration of religious organizations are not strictly enforced. However, members of the Muslim minority allege discrimination by officials and Christian residents, and police reportedly monitor mosques. Non-Christian groups are also denied airtime on state broadcasters. Construction of religious buildings must be approved by the government or local chiefs. Christian education is compulsory in public schools, and in 2017, the government banned the teaching of other religions in the public-school curriculum.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is limited by restrictive laws such as the Suppression of Terrorism Act (STA) and the SSAA. Student activists face potential violence, arrest, and suspension. In January 2022, student activist Colani Maseko was reportedly brutally assaulted and arbitrarily detained by members of the security forces while on his way to university, prompting a wave of protests. He was accused of destroying photographs of the king and charged with "sedition and malicious damage to property"; Maseko was released on bail the following month.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Constitutional rights to free expression are severely restricted in practice. Security agencies reportedly monitor personal communications, social media, and public gatherings, and criticism of the king or other elements of the regime can be punished under laws such as the SSAA, the STA, and the Public Order Act. Any criticism of Swazi culture and traditions or defacement of national symbols—including the king's image—can draw fines and up to two years in prison.

The government's crackdown on dissent in response to the widespread prodemocracy protests in 2021 led to a further deterioration of free expression within the country. That June, the king issued a decree banning citizens from delivering petitions to the government, though officials denied that the ban was intended to prevent citizens from "raising grievances." Prodemocracy activists continued to face harassment and arbitrary detentions throughout 2022.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is restricted. Surveillance of protests is common, and the information collected is reportedly used to deny protesters access to government jobs and services. Demonstrations are often violently dispersed by police, and protesters risk arrest and detention. Nevertheless, labor and prodemocracy protests have taken place in spite of these risks. Demonstrations that are not perceived as a direct challenge to the king have been allowed to go forward.

Widespread prodemocracy protests continued into 2022 despite an official ban on protests issued in October 2021. The protests began in May 2021 and escalated that June after Mswati banned citizens from petitioning the government. Security forces attempted to suppress the demonstrations, subjecting peaceful protesters to arbitrary arrests and using indiscriminate force to disperse gatherings, resulting in the deaths of more than 80 people; hundreds more were hospitalized for their injuries.

This crackdown on dissent continued in 2022. During the year, security forces attempted to forcibly disperse protesters by shooting tear gas, rubber bullets, and live ammunition into crowds. Protesters also faced arbitrary arrest and physical assaults by security forces. Student activist Colani Maseko, whose January arrest had prompted a wave of demonstrations, was arrested again in May while participating in a protest; he was allegedly tortured following his arrest. Maseko was later hospitalized from injuries sustained while he was detained.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

The operation of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) has been inhibited by broadly written sedition and terrorism laws as well as police monitoring and interference. Organizations that advocate for democracy remain banned.

Despite such restrictions, it appears there is limited tolerance of some forms of human rights–based legal activism. For example, Women and Law Southern Africa–Swaziland was allowed to bring a case on gender equality in divorce settlements, with the court deciding in its favor in 2019. In 2020, an LGBT+ advocacy organization that had been denied official registration challenged the rejection in court. The High Court ultimately upheld the rejection when it ruled against the organization, Eswatini Sexual and Gender Minorities (ESGM), in April 2022, stating that although the constitution guarantees fundamental rights "irrespective of gender or sex," those rights are subject to Eswatini's laws, which do not permit same-sex relations. One judge dissented, saying that the rejection was executed in a "grossly irregular manner."

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Eswatini has active, vocal labor unions, but workers' rights are poorly upheld in practice. Although workers in most sectors, with the exception of essential services defined by the labor minister, can join unions, strikes and other labor activism routinely trigger crackdowns and arrests by the police. A number of prodemocracy activists and former trade unions are exiled in South Africa.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Although the judiciary displays a degree of independence in some cases, the king holds ultimate authority over the appointment and removal of judges, acting on advice from the Judicial Service Commission (JSC) made up of royal appointees.

In a rare instance of judicial review that sought to change gender power relations, in 2019 the High Court of Eswatini ruled in favor of gender equality in civil marriages regarding property rights in the event of divorce.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, such as time limits on detention without charge, are not always respected in practice. Detainees are generally granted access to lawyers, though only those facing life imprisonment or capital punishment can obtain counsel at public expense. Lengthy pretrial detention is common.

Two prodemocracy members of Parliament, Mduduzi Bacede Mabuza and Mthandeni Dube, have been repeatedly denied bail and access to their lawyer since they were arrested on specious terrorism charges in July 2021; both parliamentarians remained in detention through year-end 2022.

Despite the 2018 passage of the Police Service Act, which prescribes disciplinary measures for police officers who use illegitimate force, physical abuse of suspects and inmates by law enforcement officials is an ongoing problem, and investigations into such abuse lack independence and transparency. Mduduzi Bacede Mabuza and Mthandeni Dube, two prodemocracy parliamentarians arrested during the 2021 crackdown on dissent, were reportedly brutally assaulted by prison security forces in September 2022.

The 2021 death of Thabani Nkomonye, a student allegedly killed by police using excessive force, sparked a series of protests against police brutality that evolved into widespread antigovernment demonstrations. Security forces responded to the protests with disproportionate force; at least 200 people were hospitalized and more than 80 were reportedly killed by security forces during the protests. The government's crackdown on dissent continued in 2022; numerous reports indicate that during the year, security officials shot tear gas, rubber bullets, and live ammunition into crowds of protesters, performed arbitrary arrests, and physically assaulted demonstrators during protests.

Women's rights remain restricted in law and in practice. Both civil and customary law treat women as dependents of their fathers or husbands, and societal discrimination further impairs their access to education and employment. Residents who are not ethnic Swazis also face de facto discrimination. People with disabilities experience social stigma as well as discrimination in education and employment. In 2018, King Mswati signed the Persons with Disabilities Act, intended to address many of the inequities experienced by disabled residents.

Discrimination against LGBT+ people is not prohibited by law and is widespread in practice. A criminal ban on same-sex sexual activity is not regularly enforced.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of movement. However, minority ethnic groups and political activists have faced delays in obtaining passports and other citizenship documents. Traditional chiefs regulate movement and residence within their communities and generally deny access to groups advocating for human rights or democracy. Individuals who violate customary rules can face eviction from their localities. Widows in mourning are barred from approaching chiefs or the king and excluded from certain public places and activities.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

The constitution provides legal protections for property rights, but women generally face limitations under customary rules that subordinate them to male relatives. Widows in particular face displacement by the deceased husband's family. Chiefs have broad authority to allocate and withdraw rights to communal land. However, in 2019, the High Court ruled in favor of gender equality in civil marriages, granting women property rights in the event of divorce.

Individuals sometimes face expropriation due to land claims by state-owned companies and powerful private interests. Constitutional guarantees of fair compensation are not upheld in practice.

Women's social freedoms are restricted by both civil and customary law, which puts them at a disadvantage regarding marriage, divorce, and child custody. Customary law allowed girls as young as 13 to marry. Sexual and domestic violence remains extremely common; in 2020, the UN resident coordinator for Eswatini reported that 48 percent of Swazi women and girls experience sexual violence in their lifetimes. Punishment for perpetrators is often lenient.

The Eswatini government made progress on women's rights in 2019 by amending the 1964 Marriage Act to prohibit marriages of persons under the age of 18 and passing the Sexual Offences and Domestic Violence Act, which criminalizes nonconsensual sex between spouses.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Residents have some access to formal employment and economic opportunity, but the majority of the population lives in poverty. Forced labor remains a problem, with some chiefs compelling Swazis, including children, to work in their communities or the king's fields. Among other forms of child labor, girls are particularly vulnerable to domestic servitude and commercial sexual exploitation. The royal family has extensive privileges compared to ordinary citizens.

Ethiopia

Population: 123,400,000
Capital: Addis Ababa
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The appointment of Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed, who came to power after Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn resigned in the face of mass protests, set off a transitional period in Ethiopia. Abiy pledged to reform Ethiopia's authoritarian state and has held elections and implemented some liberalization policies. However, Ethiopia remains beset by civil war and intercommunal violence, abuses by security forces and violations of due process are still common, and many restrictive laws remain in force. Since late 2020 and until November 2022, fighting between the Federal Government and the Tigray Defense Force (TDF) has led to the displacement of millions and credible allegations of atrocity crimes, and violence has spilled over into neighboring regions.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In March, the federal government and the Tigray regional government declared a humanitarian truce in the Tigray region, though fighting resumed again in August. In November, the federal government and Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF) signed a Permanent Cessation of Hostilities Agreement, through peace talks mediated by the African Union. The conflict in Tigray over the course of two years caused the deaths of an estimated 600,000 people, and there remains a high risk of further mass atrocities being committed.
- In September, the UN International Commission of Human Rights Experts on Ethiopia (ICHREE) released their investigative report into the nature of the violence committed in the Tigray and Amhara regions by armed forces. They concluded that all of the warring parties had committed war crimes or crimes against humanity over the course of the conflict.
- Throughout the year in Oromia, Amhara militants were implicated in numerous killings of Oromo civilians and the displacement of tens of thousands of people in areas bordering the Amhara region, which Amhara authorities attempted to annex. The Amhara government did not comment on the attacks and at times tried to justify them. Oromo militants also targeted Amhara civilians in Oromia.
- In May, government forces arrested over 4,500 individuals, including journalists and activists, in what was a widespread crackdown in the Amhara region. The crackdown was allegedly intended to disarm and demilitarize the Amhara militia known as the Fano, which had been recruited by the federal government to fight in the Tigray conflict and had likely committed war crimes. The government provided no justification for the arrests, and whether the people arrested in May remained in custody at the end of the year was unclear.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 10 / 40 (−2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 4 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president is the head of state and is indirectly elected to a six-year term by both chambers of Parliament. The prime minister is head of government and is selected by the largest party in Parliament after elections, or in the case of a resignation.

Following general elections in June and September 2021, Prime Minister Abiy's Prosperity Party formed a new cabinet that included three opposition party members. In October, Abiy was sworn in for a new five-year mandate. Despite their landslide victory, the results were contested by political actors who were excluded or who did not participate in the process due to perceived unfairness.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The bicameral Parliament includes the 153-seat House of Federation, whose members are elected by state assemblies to five-year terms, and the House of People's Representatives, with 547 members directly elected to five-year terms.

The June and September 2021 parliamentary and regional elections were seen as an opportunity for the country to break from its past of undemocratic elections. Changes in electoral laws and reform of the NEBE improved the body's operations and encouraged far more opposition parties to participate than ever before. A total of 46 political parties participated in the elections, fielding 9,505 candidates. An estimated 37 million people registered to vote, and some 90 percent of registered voters cast a ballot. Final results from the National Electoral Board of Ethiopia (NEBE) confirmed a majority for the Prosperity Party, which won over 410 of 436 constituencies contested. Polls were indefinitely postponed in Tigray.

Despite improvements, the elections were fraught with insecurity, registration problems, and other challenges that limited widespread acceptance of the outcomes as free and fair. Numerous political parties raised concerns about the closure of their offices by security agents, harassment, imprisonment, and killings of their members. In this context, key opposition groups boycotted the election, resulting in many uncontested seats. While more competitive than previous elections, the 2021 polls still fell short of conferring broad-based legitimacy to the elected government among significant political factions in the country.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

Several reforms to the electoral system and its oversight have taken shape under Prime Minister Abiy. Parliament unanimously passed the 2019 Ethiopian Election, Political Parties Registration, and Election Ethics law. The new legal framework reduced restrictions that had limited the participation of opposition groups and failed to recognize voting rights of marginalized sections of the population, such as international displaced persons (IDPs) and prisoners.

Challenges that arose during the 2021 polls tested the impartiality and credibility of the NEBE and the broader electoral framework, including regarding the participation of imprisoned political candidates. One party, the Balderas for True Democracy, sought legal recourse to ensure imprisoned candidates were registered and succeeded when the Federal High Court directed the NEBE to allow the jailed candidates to participate. Electoral authorities initially resisted the court order, saying ballots had already been printed, but ultimately reprinted ballots to include the Balderas candidates. Similarly, several Oromo political parties filed their case to the court after being denied accreditation by the NEBE and the court ruled for them, though they did not participate in the election due to the lengthy court proceedings.

The lack of a complete census, which was scheduled to be completed in 2017 but was repeatedly delayed due to security concerns, remains a major impediment to the demarcation of constituencies that ensure fair representation based on accurate population estimates. With the exception of the newly established Sidama regional state, the distribution of electoral constituencies has not changed from the original distribution established in 1995.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 4 / 16

The transition beginning in 2018 initially brought progressive political reforms, but crackdowns in 2020—first after the assassination of Oromo musician Hachalu Hundessa and its aftermath in June, and then after the beginning of the conflict in Tigray in November of that year—harmed political pluralism. In May 2021, the House of Peoples' Representatives designated the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF) and "OLF-Shene"—the government term for Oromo Liberation Army (OLA)—as terrorist organizations, accusing them (with credible evidence) of carrying out acts of politically motivated violence against government officials and civilian targets based on their ethnic identity. Consequently, thousands of Tigrayans and Oromos accused of being affiliated with the TPLF or OLA have faced arrest and other pressure. Oromo political leaders, including top officials of the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) party, have also faced pressure and are subjected to abuses in prison, having been arrested after the assassination of Hundessa without due process.

The Prosperity Party won a landslide victory in 2021 polls, taking almost 95 percent of the 436 constituency seats contested in June, and numerous opposition candidates entered the new parliament. The party has accused opposition officials and government critics of having links with rebel groups and hindered their participation in the country's politics. Key opposition groups including the Oromo Federalist Congress (OFC), the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), and the OLF boycotted the 2021 elections, citing electoral mismanagement and harassment by the ruling party.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The designation in 2021 of the TPLF and the OLA as terrorist organizations has been detrimental to the political support bases of the parties. The TPLF had dominated national and regional politics in Tigray for the past three decades. The military conflict against the OLA and the government's crackdown on opposition members and supporters following the 2020 Hundessa assassination further limited Oromo people's political rights.

Similarly, the government has used the 2021 designation of the OLA as a terrorist organization to crack down on nonviolent opposition supporters and members under the pretext of affiliation with terrorists.

The Tigray conflict with the TPLF also led Prime Minister Abiy to seek external military and political support from President Isaias Afwerki of Eritrea. The presence within Tigray of the Eritrean Defense Forces (EDF)—who have been accused of widespread atrocities and sexual violence—exacerbated the conflict and were an impediment to its resolution throughout 2022.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Women hold around 41 percent of seats in the House of People's Representatives and around 30 percent in the House of Federation, but the percentage of women candidates for the lower house in the 2021 elections was just below 16 percent. Women remain significantly underrepresented across both elected and appointed positions. Currently, only 8 of the 22 cabinet members are women. Ethiopia criminalizes LGBT+ activity, and LGBT+ people do not identify themselves openly.

Since 1991, political parties in Ethiopia have primarily been based on ethnicity. However, upon coming to office, Prime Minister Abiy has advocated a message of national unity and expressed disagreement with the enduring legacies of ethnic politics. In recent years, political alliances between major political factions within the country have realigned, with Tigrayan and Oromo parties urging for more decentralized power to ethnically defined regions, and other political parties generally in favor of nonethnically defined federalism and a greater unifying role played by the central government. Ethnic groups like the Gurage and Wolaita have been denied their demand for regional statehood, despite the constitution allowing for such a designation.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

The shortcomings of the 2021 elections, including a climate of insecurity and growing repression of some opposition groups, suggest that gains in political reform have stalled and, in the absence of stability, may eventually be reversed.

The escalation of violence in Tigray, which was further worsened by the deployment of Eritrean troops, prevented the 2021 elections from occurring in the region, leaving people there without elected representatives. In November 2022, the federal government and the TPLF signed a peace treaty through talks mediated by the African Union, following a humanitarian truce that was signed in March but had broken down in August.

Some areas plagued by insecurity remain out of the control of the government—such as parts of Oromia—while others have been under prolonged states of emergency, with heightened military presence and control, including parts of Oromia, Amhara, and Benishangul Gumuz.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption and unequal resource distribution are significant problems that have contributed to the recent civil unrest throughout Ethiopia. However, the ruling party has accused public servants or opposition politicians of corruption as a political weapon to punish dissent. Petty bribery and corruption, often involving local officials and police, are widespread. Corruption within the justice system remains a significant challenge, and judges caught accepting bribes are rarely punished.

In July 2022, federal police arrested the commissioner of the National Disaster Risk Management Commission, Mitiku Kassa, on suspicion of corruption. Kassa was accused of colluding with the leader of a humanitarian organization called the Elshadai Relief and Development Association, embezzling money by selling food and clothing that were ostensibly designated for internally displaced persons (IDPs) camps. The camps that the supplies were allegedly intended for do not exist.

The government established a national committee to coordinate an anticorruption campaign in November 2022. The committee announced it had received over 250 tips within a week of its creation and testified to the widespread presence of corruption, labeling it as a major threat to national security. Several current officials were implicated in land embezzlement cases. In December, several officials suspected of corruption were arrested, including Tewodros Bekele, director general of the Ethiopian Financial Security Services (EFSS).

Despite these seemingly positive steps, the 2022 anticorruption campaign only focuses on malfeasance within institutions at the federal level. Whether the government intends to carry out new anticorruption investigations with integrity, without using it to repress political opposition members, is unclear.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

At the start of the war in Tigray internet and telephone lines were cut and journalists were denied access to the region. The involvement of Eritrean soldiers, the status of refugee camps, and the humanitarian situation in Tigray all remain shrouded in uncertainty.

Very little information is available about counter-insurgency operations and ethnic conflicts in Oromia, Benishangul Gumuz, and Amhara. The extent of the human rights abuses and war crimes committed in these areas remain difficult to verify. While state media and the government's official communications throughout 2022 emphasized the limited nature of what it has termed a "law enforcement operation," media and other reports of alleged atrocities, sexual violence, and the expanding conflict have contradicted the government's narrative.

Amid widespread impunity for security forces, the government's efforts to ensure accountability for the human rights abuses committed by its forces lacks transparency.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? −2 / 0 (−2)

Since the war in northern Ethiopia began in late 2020, Amhara regional forces have taken control of and attempted to annex areas in Western Tigray, with the support of Ethiopian National Defense Forces (ENDF) and the EDF. Human Rights Watch (HRW) and Amnesty International also reported in April 2022 that newly-appointed officials in Western Tigray and Amhara security forces, with the acquiescence and possible involvement of Ethiopian federal forces, had ordered the removal of hundreds of thousands of Tigrayans from their homes "using threats, unlawful killings, sexual violence, mass arbitrary detention, pillage, forcible transfer, and the denial of humanitarian assistance." Amhara forces were implicated in assaulting ethnic Tigrayans in a campaign of ethnic cleansing, with the intent of changing the ethnic composition of the region.

Authorities been complicit in the frequent ethnic-based attacks on civilians by militants. In Oromia, Amhara militants were implicated in numerous 2022 killings of Oromo civilians and displacement of tens of thousands of people in areas bordering the Amhara region, which Amhara authorities attempted to annex. The Amhara government did not comment on the attacks and at times tried to justify them. Oromo militants have also targeted Amhara civilians in Oromia.

Several credible reports, including from the ICHREE, have implicated Ethiopian and Eritrean forces in the mass arrest, forced disappearance, and killings of ethnic Tigrayans in western and southeastern parts of Tigray.

Score Change: The score declined from 0 to −2 because state and nonstate actors, including regional officials, security forces, and militias, have targeted ethnic Tigrayans and Oromo people in Oromia, Tigray, and other parts of Ethiopia.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 11 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Independent journalists remain constrained by security imperatives that limit their ability to work and travel. While a 2021 media law adopted by the Abiy government seemed to offer a more liberal framework and protective legal environment for journalists, in practice this has not been the case. In April 2022, the parliament broke the terms of the media law and approved the appointment of members of the Prosperity Party to the board of the Ethiopian Media Authority (EMA). Under the law, EMA board members were supposed to be chosen in an open and transparent process.

International and Ethiopian journalists and media networks repeatedly come under government pressure over their coverage of the internal conflicts in Tigray and Oromo, as well as other political dynamics. In 2022, journalists in some cases were detained, expelled from the country, or had their licenses revoked. The EMA and security institutions warned and threatened media outlets reporting on the violent conflicts and pressured them to adhere to the government narrative. Journalists also faced pressure, arrests, threats, and harassment—both online and offline—from the government to disclose the identities of their sources.

Numerous Ethiopian journalists have been imprisoned without charges. In August 2022, the federal police announced that charges had been filed against 111 owners of "illegal" digital media outlets, accusing them of working to incite violence. Many self-censor or use pseudonyms to attempt to avoid persecution.

Most private media outlets are established with a goal of satisfying distinct political or ethnic group's interests. Reports from state media agencies must follow the narrative of the ruling party; content that is contrary to the government's narrative is removed.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

The Ethiopian constitution guarantees religious freedom, and different faith groups have coexisted in the country for centuries. However, religion has increasingly become a divisive factor in Ethiopian politics, and local conflicts have featured violence along religious lines. In April 2022, Muslim individuals were attacked in Gondar in the Amhara region by heavily armed assailants, resulting in the death of at least 20 civilians, over 150 people were injured, Muslim-owned properties were looted, and religious buildings were destroyed. In what was deemed a retaliatory attack, two Christians were killed and five Orthodox churches were burned in the Silte zone of Southern Nations, Nationalities, and People's Regions (SNNPR).

In November 2022, Amharic speaking militants raided a protestant church in a village in the East Wollega Zone of Oromia and killed 15 participants of the church service, including church leaders.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom remains restricted in Ethiopia, though academics have become more vocal on political and economic matters in lectures, at conferences, in media columns, and online since the lifting of the state of emergency in 2018. However, self-censorship remains common in the context of ongoing conflicts and political tensions.

With few exceptions, institutions of higher education are funded and administered by the federal government, which also sets admission standards and student quotas. The Ministry of Education still monitors and regulates official curriculums. According to a September 2022 report from the Ethiopian Ethics and Anti-Corruption Commission, corruption is a widespread issue throughout higher education institutions.

University leadership has spread hate speech about ethnic Tigrayans and Oromo people. In June 2022, police attacked students at Addis Ababa University protesting ongoing ethnic violence against Amhara communities in the Wollega region. In August, Bonga University dismissed 54 Oromo students, following students' demands for an investigation into the killing of an Oromo student on campus.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

The government silences critical voices and the voices of its political opponents to control the narratives around the civil war in Tigray and conflicts in other regions, especially Oromia. Its crackdown on individuals and political institutions with opposing views has pushed individuals to refrain from commenting on sensitive topics, including political issues.

Nationwide sweeps, raids, and arrests, as well as a rising tolerance for hate speech and incitement to violence by authorities and other public figures—particularly against Tigrayans and Oromo people—have intensified a climate of fear around expressing personal views. Government forces arrested over 4,500 individuals, including journalists and activists, during a May 2022 crackdown in the Amhara region. The crackdown was allegedly intended to disarm and demilitarize the Amhara militia known as the Fano, which had been recruited by the federal government to fight in the Tigray conflict and had likely committed war crimes. In August, authorities in the SNNPR arrested several Gurage Zone officials accusing them of favoring the Gurage regional government's statehood demand.

Government security agencies surveil individuals and politicians through wire-tapping. Digital surveillance and the use of individual informants to spy on people is widespread. Ethiopian authorities purchased an Israeli surveillance system from the company Cellebrite, which they have used to hack into the mobile phones of detainees since 2021.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Free assembly is restricted by insecurity in several regions and associated declarations of states of emergency or martial law. The nationwide state of emergency enacted in November 2021 that lasted until February 2022 further curtailed freedom of assembly and other civil liberties throughout the country.

Government forces continued to violently disperse protests throughout 2022. In May, federal police used tear gas and gunfire to disperse rioters after clashes between police and Muslim worshippers occurred at Meskel Square in Addis Ababa during the Eid al-Fitr prayer.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Under a civil society law passed in 2019, the federal Authority for Civil Society Organizations (ACSO) retains broad powers. Moreover, while nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are more able to legally operate in the human rights and governance spheres, practically many of these organizations are unable to access large parts of Ethiopia either due to security challenges or a lack of official approval, as was the case in Tigray. While the discourse around NGOs is more open, many of the practical realities for these groups have not improved.

Local civil society organizations (CSOs) face threats and warnings for advocating for issues contrary to the government's position, especially in relation to internal conflicts. In September 2022, government security agents prevented a group of 35 CSOs from hosting a press event with media representatives, in which they were to call for warring parties in Ethiopia to end the violence and come to the negotiate a peace deal. The organizations instead independently issued a statement calling for the cessation of violence in Tigray. Days later, the government threatened to revoke the licenses of the organizations involved, claiming they had acted against the "sovereignty of the country and the public interest."

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The Ethiopian Constitution recognizes the right of workers to join trade unions, and more than 500,000 workers are organized under the umbrella of the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions (CETU). However, independent unions have faced harassment in the past, and there has not been a legal strike in Ethiopia since 1993.

On the employer side, a large number of chambers of commerce and business associations exist for different industries and locations. The largest and oldest among them, the Addis Ababa Chamber of Commerce, is a regular critic of government economic policy. The federally organized Ethiopian Chamber of Commerce, of which the Addis chamber is a member, has been more aligned with official policy.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is officially independent, but in practice it is subject to political interference, and judgments rarely deviate from government policy. Ethiopia's security forces have maintained significant influence over the judicial process, especially in cases against opposition leaders and other political adversaries. Judges who attempt to exercise independence have faced arrests by authorities. Courts remain complicit in ensuring impunity for security forces, especially in relation to the political prisoners.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Due process rights are generally not respected. The right to a fair trial is often not respected, particularly for government critics. In civil matters, due process is hampered by the limited capacity of the Ethiopian courts system, especially in the peripheral regions where access to government services is weak. As a result, routine matters regularly take years to be resolved.

Human rights abuses and extrajudicial punishments by security forces occur widely throughout the country, and most security forces who commit the abuses go unpunished.

In May 2022, Ethiopian security forces arbitrarily arrested more than 4,500 people in the Amhara region, including journalists and activists, in an attempt to crack down on the Fano militia group that bases its operations there. The government provided no justification for the arrests, and whether the people arrested in May remained in custody at the end of the year was unclear.

Several conflicts have intensified in 2022—most notably in Oromia—but there has also been growing instability in Amhara, Afar, Tigray, and other regions. According to UN figures, as of July 2022, there were 2.72 million internally displaced people across Ethiopia, mostly due to the conflicts. Security forces have been accused of war crimes, including the rape and massacring of civilians. Despite the November peace deal ending the Tigray conflict, which had caused the deaths of an estimated 600,000 people, high risk of mass atrocities in the region remains.

Extrajudicial executions and human rights abuses by security forces remain widespread. A report released in September 2022 by the ICHREE implicated the government and its allied forces in crimes against humanity, and claimed the other warring parties in the Tigray conflict had committed war crimes.

An ongoing government campaign to suppress armed opposition forces in western Oromia has led to repeated clashes and widespread displacement. According to the ICHREE, in 2022 incidents of large-scale killings targeting ethnic groups increased in Oromia, perpetrated by Amhara militias, the OLA, Oromia Special Forces, and the ENDF. In June and July, hundreds of civilians, mainly ethnic Amhara, were killed in the West Wollega and Kellem Wollega zones of Oromia by armed assailants. Between August and early December, dozens of ethnic Oromo were killed in Horo Guduru and East Wollega zones by militants from the Amhara region, allegedly the Fano.

In March 2022, government forces burned a civilian alive in Benishangul Gumuz. In June, at least 50 civilians were extrajudicially executed in Gambella following the offensive against security forces by joint forces from the Gambella Liberation Front (GLF) and OLA.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

The ongoing conflict in Oromia, the two years of civil war in Tigray, and political tensions throughout the country have inflamed ethnic divisions, contributing to discriminatory policies and actions against certain groups. Tigrayan, Amhara, and Oromo groups and activists have spoken out about the increasing number of targeted attacks and discrimination they have experienced.

The number of IDPs in Ethiopia surpassed 2.72 million as of July 2022, and humanitarian groups have struggled to meet the growing need.

Same-sex sexual activity is prohibited by law and punishable by up to 15 years' imprisonment. Women face discrimination in education. A gender gap persists in many aspects of economic life, including women's wages relative to men in similar positions; according to the World Bank's Gender Innovation Lab, women have far lower wage incomes (44 percent lower) and business sales (79 percent lower) than men.

Despite near-universal primary school enrollment, access to quality education and other social services varies widely across regions and is particularly poor in the "emerging" lowland states.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

While the constitution establishes freedom of movement, local conflicts impede people's ability to travel freely. Travel to Tigray, several parts of Oromia, and other parts of Ethiopia have been severely impeded due to the violent conflicts. The intentional destruction of infrastructure such as roads and bridges by armed actors has also undermined civilian and humanitarian movement.

Though the government and the Tigray administration agreed to end hostilities in November 2022, the conflict impeded people's movement in the region throughout the year.

Violent conflict and security clampdowns in Amhara, Afar, Oromia, and Benishangul Gumuz have also significantly reduced internal travel, with most Ethiopians feeling safer in their home region than in other states.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Private business opportunities are limited by heavy government regulation of key industries and the dominance of state-owned enterprises in many sectors. State monopolies have persisted in the telecommunication, shipping, and aviation industries, while the financial sector is closed to foreign competition and effectively controlled by state-owned banks.

All land must be leased from the state. A gender gap persists in many aspects of economic life including land ownership and access to finance.

The conflicts have hindered people's ability to exercise their right to own property and private businesses. The ICHREE's 2022 report documented widespread looting and destruction of properties by government forces, its allied forces—including Eritrean forces—and Tigrayan forces in Tigray, Amhara, and Afar, as a result of the war in Tigray. The rising number of attacks targeting ethnic groups committed by armed militants resulted in the destruction and looting of properties in Benishangul Gumuz, Amhara, SNNP, Oromia, and other regions.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Legislation protects women's rights, but these rights are routinely violated in practice. Enforcement of laws against rape and domestic abuse is inconsistent, and cases routinely stall in the courts. Particularly in conflict-affected areas, people have barely any legal protections in practice. The government and its allied forces have been implicated in committing widespread acts of rape and sexual violence against Tigrayan women and girls, with the particular goal of rendering them infertile.

Forced child marriage is illegal but common in Ethiopia, and prosecutions for the crime are rare. Female genital mutilation (FGM) is also illegal, but the law is inconsistently enforced. In Tigray, the conflict and the humanitarian crisis have resulted in an increase of instances of child marriage, child labor, human trafficking, and coerced sex. Civilians in Tigray have been sex trafficked by the ENDF, its regional allied forces, and Eritrean forces.

LGBT+ people do not have social freedoms and do not publicly identify themselves, for fear of violent retaliation. Same-sex sexual relations are illegal.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Ethiopia's 2019 labor law extended paid maternity leave and raised the working age to 15 years. However, reports from Ethiopia's industrial parks suggest that working conditions can be precarious, and child labor is prevalent in many agricultural households.

Ethiopia has an antitrafficking law that stipulates strict punishments for crimes such as sexual exploitation and human trafficking. People in Ethiopia, particularly women and girls, continue to experience forced labor, debt bondage, and other forms of exploitative labor practices.

Fiji

Population: 900,000
Capital: Suva
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The repressive climate that followed a 2006 coup has eased, with democratic elections held in 2014 and 2018, and a peaceful transfer of power following 2022 elections. However, the ruling party frequently interferes with opposition activities, the judiciary is subject to political influence, and military and police brutality is a significant problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In December, a general election resulted in a coalition of three opposition parties forming a government. Sitiveni Rabuka of the People's Alliance Party (PAP) was elected prime minister, taking over from Frank Bainimarama, who had held the post since 2006. Bainimarama, of the FijiFirst Party, became leader of the opposition.

- In September, Parliament passed a controversial Electoral (Amendment) Bill, which increased the powers of the Supervisor of Elections (SoE) and established binding rules for the conduct of opinion polls.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 24 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The prime minister is the head of government. The party that wins the most seats in parliamentary elections selects the prime minister, who is then appointed by the president. In December 2022 parliamentary elections, the ruling FijiFirst Party and a coalition of two opposition parties, the PAP and the National Federation Party (NFP), each won 26 seats. The balance, 3 seats in the 55-member parliament, was won by the Social Democratic Liberal Party (SODELPA). After some equivocation, SODELPA decided to join the opposition coalition to form a government, the first that would not be led by Frank Bainimarama since he had taken power in a 2006 coup. Sitiveni Rabuka, head of the PAP, was elected by a secret ballot of members of parliament days later, 28 votes to 27.

In an interim press statement before the conclusion of the count, the Multinational Observer Group reported that they "did not observe any significant irregularities or issues during pre-polling, postal voting or Election Day voting." Opposition leaders had raised allegations of irregularities after a glitch in the official elections office app forced a pause in vote counting.

The president is elected by Parliament for a three-year term and holds a largely ceremonial role. In October 2021, Ratu Wiliame Katonivere was elected president, replacing former president George Konrote.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

Parliament is Fiji's unicameral legislative body, with 55 members elected to serve four-year terms. International observers of the 2018 and 2022 parliamentary elections found polling largely credible, although civil society participation was limited. The country uses an open list proportional representation system with a single, nationwide constituency; candidates are represented only by numbers on ballot papers.

Municipal elections have not been held since 2005. Municipal councils were dissolved in 2009 and have since been run by government-appointed administrators.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The legal framework for Fijian elections is considered fair. However, the structure of the electoral administration has raised concerns about potential political interference. Until December 2022, FijiFirst's secretary general, Aiyaz Sayed-Khaiyum, served as minister of elections as well as attorney general.

A July 2021 decision by the Supervisor of Elections, Mohammed Saneem, removed opposition parliamentarian Niko Nawaikula from the voter registry on the grounds that he had not registered under his birth name. Nawaikula was forced to vacate his seat, but was reinstated in August by Fiji's chief justice, who criticized Saneem for overextending his authority.

Following Nawaikula's reinstatement, the FijiFirst majority in Parliament passed an amendment to the Electoral Act in September 2021 requiring citizens to use the name "specified on the applicant's birth certificate" on the voter registry. The opposition has expressed concern that the rule will disproportionately affect women voters whose birth names differ from their marital names. In December 2021, seven women brought a case before the High Court alleging discrimination against women occasioned by the amendment. The government that came to power in December 2022 promised to reverse this requirement.

Other 2021 and 2022 amendments to the electoral law increase the powers of the Supervisor of Elections (SoE) significantly. The Law Council of Australia warned that the 2022 amendment gives the SoE "extraordinarily broad information gathering powers without adequate safeguards or oversight mechanisms."

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16 (+1)

The right to form political parties is constitutionally guaranteed, but the government has eligibility requirements that discourage the formation of smaller parties: prospective parties must submit 5,000 signatures to become registered. The 5 percent nationwide threshold for representation in Parliament further disincentivizes the formation of smaller parties. In September 2021, Rabuka, who had formerly led the SODELPA, successfully registered a new party, the PAP, that would become part of the ruling coalition in December 2022.

In July 2021, nine leading opposition figures were detained and questioned by police after voicing opposition to Bill 17, a controversial draft law that would alter how native land leases are administered by the iTaukei Land Trust Board; the bill was passed into law in August 2021.

For many years, the dominance of FijiFirst in Parliament left little space for opposition forces to assert themselves politically. The victory of the opposition in the December 2022 polls demonstrates that, despite all the advantages of incumbency, the electoral framework allowed the rise of an opposition that could defeat the FijiFirst government. Bainimarama stepped aside and became the leader of the opposition, despite having said in the past that he would not allow opposition parties to assume office in the event that FijiFirst was defeated. The military commander, Major General Jone Logavatu Kalouniwai, has promised to abide by the election result.

In the lead-up to the December 2022 election, the government targeted many opposition figures with accusations of corruption, breach of election law, and other wrongdoing. In one case, in September 2022, the SoE referred a "Rock the Vote" organization affiliated with Member of Parliament Lynda Tabuya of the PAP to the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption (FICAC) for an alleged breach of the Political Parties Registration Act.

In 2022, three former SODELPA members of Parliament were given prison sentences of two to three years for obtaining parliamentary allowances by stating that their permanent place of residence was in their home village when they in fact resided in the capital, Suva.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because an opposition party successfully formed a coalition government after the December elections, displacing a long-serving incumbent prime minister.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

The 2013 constitution provides that "it shall be the overall responsibility of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces (RFMF) to ensure at all times the security, defence and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians," but the military has a history of interference in Fijian politics. Several prominent political leaders, including both Bainimarama and Rabuka, are former military commanders, which contributes to the perception that the military has undue political influence.

In the immediate aftermath of the December 2022 election, the commissioner of police, Brigadier-General Sitiveni Qiliho, citing claims of impending ethnic unrest and tension, called for a deployment of the RFMF in Suva. The RFMF accepted the call, but the military commander repeatedly promised to abide by the election result.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The law does not restrict the participation of minorities and women in politics. However, both Indigenous and Indo-Fijian women are underrepresented by political parties. Only 6 out of the 55 members of Parliament are women following the 2022 elections. A law passed under Bainimarama requiring voters to register using the name on their birth certificates disproportionately affects women. The Rabuka government has promised to reverse that law.

Small minority groups, including Banabans, members of the Chinese ethnic minority, and the descendants of people from the Solomon Islands, lack significant political representation.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The executive branch under the prime minister determines the policies of government. With the 2022 elections resulting in a transfer of power and a relatively evenly divided Parliament, legislators may have a greater role in consulting on legislation than they did when FijiFirst held a strong parliamentary majority.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem, and existing safeguards are limited in their effectiveness. FICAC has had limited success combatting institutional corruption. FICAC has allegedly been used to pursue politically motivated cases, such as against opposition politicians or their supporters. The PAP made a campaign pledge to abolish FICAC, but the commission is stipulated in the 2013 constitution.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Since the restoration of elective democracy in 2014, government transparency and openness has improved. Parliamentary sessions are broadcast live, and the Hansard (an official report of parliamentary proceedings) is updated regularly. Although candidates for elections are required to declare their assets, there is no law requiring public asset disclosures by members of Parliament. Fiji lacks an access to information law, and requests for information from the media and the public are sometimes denied. In recent years, FijiFirst has used its parliamentary majority to rewrite parliamentary standing orders in a manner that limits debate on legislation and scrutiny of official statements. A review of standing orders by the incoming government is set to begin in January 2023.

The 2013 Constitution was decreed into law prior to the first post–2006 coup elections in 2014, and after minimal public consultation. It cannot be changed without the support of 75 percent of all registered voters in a referendum and 75 percent of Parliament, though the method of its adoption without public consent could be subjected to judicial review.

The head of Fiji's Bureau of Statistics, Kemueli Naiqama, was dismissed in September 2021 for publishing data on ethnicity in the 2019–2020 Household Income and Expenditure Survey. The Attorney General questioned the reliability of the data, which showed that the majority of people experiencing poverty in the country are Indigenous Fijians. Local human rights organizations have expressed concern that Naiqama was fired "for telling the truth."

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 35 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 11 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Fiji has an active media sector, with several private television stations, radio stations, and newspapers. The political opposition and other critics of the FijiFirst government accused the state of using its power to silence critics. The vaguely worded Media Industry Development Decree bans reporting that is critical of the government or harmful to "national interest public order." Restrictive press laws are sometimes enforced by the government, and the risk of fines and jail time encourages self-censorship.

In August 2021, a former government advisor reported that the attorney general regularly tells the openly progovernment newspaper the Fiji Sun which stories to cover. Nevertheless, there has been a notable increase in articles critical of government in the national media in recent years.

The Electoral (Amendment) Bill passed in September 2022 established rules for the publication of opinion polls and steep penalties for not complying with those rules that media and civil society organizations described as onerous and chilling.

The Rabuka government has promised to ease restraints on the media.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is generally respected, though in the past there have been many cases of vandalism of Hindu temples. In July 2021, there were reports of arson attacks on mosques and Muslim-owned shops on the island of Taveuni and in Labasa.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom is not directly constrained, but government control over funding has been used to exert influence over tertiary institutions. The FijiFirst government continued in 2022 to withhold funding for the Fiji-based University of the South Pacific (USP) on the grounds that the university's leadership had engaged in misconduct. Vice Chancellor Pal Ahluwalia had launched an investigation into irregularities under his predecessor, who was known to be close to the Fiji government. Though the government deported Ahluwalia, a Canadian citizen, in February 2021, he now runs the university from neighboring Samoa while living in exile. In December 2022, days after Rabuka was sworn in as prime minister, he invited Ahluwalia to return to Fiji and promised to restore the funds owed to USP by the government.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

The government places some constraints on free speech, such as a law banning the burning of the national flag. In July 2021, the acting police commissioner warned the public to be cautious when expressing opposition to Bill 17 on social media.

In September 2022, lawyer and prospective opposition candidate Richard Naidu, a vociferous critic of the government, was found guilty of contempt and "scandalizing the court" after he pointed out on Facebook that a High Court judge misspelled the word "injunction" as "injection." The sentencing is scheduled for January 2023.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution gives the government wide latitude to prohibit protests, including on the basis of public safety and morality. Fiji has refused entry into the country for the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights to freedom of assembly since 2014.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Fiji has an extensive nongovernmental organization (NGO) network, which largely operates without government interference. However, strict sedition laws, which criminalize criticism of the government, place constraints on the range of initiatives that NGOs can undertake. In May 2022, Bainimarama criticized two of Fiji's longstanding NGOs—the Fiji Women's Crisis Centre and the Foundation for Rural Integrated Enterprises and Development (FRIEND)—calling them political opposition groups rather than NGOs after the organizations voiced support for a nonpartisan caretaker government to see the country through the December elections.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Restrictions on trade union protests remain. The Fiji Trades Union Congress (FTUC) has been denied permits for marches numerous times in recent years.

Union members' political activities are also restricted: they are prohibited from becoming members of Parliament and face obstacles to joining political parties. General secretary of the National Workers Union and the FTUC, Felix Anthony, appeared in court in April and November 2021 over his activities during a 2019 protest by water authority workers. Amnesty International reported a rise in harassment of trade unionists in the leadup to these protests and other important union meetings.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

While the constitution guarantees an independent judiciary, there have been credible allegations of political interference among judges. The prime minister has substantial appointment powers, with the authority to both appoint and dismiss judges on the Supreme Court and other high courts. These powers leave the judiciary vulnerable to interference and abuse by the executive. Fiji has refused entry into the country for the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the independence of judges since 2014.

The Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, passed by Parliament in February 2021, removed assessors—lay judicial advisors—from trials, leaving verdicts in criminal cases solely to judges. Though the attorney general at the time claimed the assessor system had contributed to discrimination based on ethnicity in court decisions, opposition leaders criticized the amendments, saying that removing assessors eliminates public participation and reduces transparency in the criminal justice system.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are often not respected in practice. Corruption is a major problem in the police force. Due to resource shortages, lengthy pretrial detentions are common. The law allows suspects to be arrested without a warrant for violating the Crimes Decree. Politically motivated criminal charges are not uncommon.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Torture and beatings by police remain a serious issue. Police officers and military officials who commit abuses are rarely brought to justice, and those who are convicted of crimes are frequently pardoned or have their convictions overturned on appeal. In May 2022, there was widespread criticism after a video circulated on social media showing a police officer apparently assaulting a bus driver during an arrest.

Prisons are often overcrowded, lack sanitation, and provide inadequate health services. Fiji refuses entry into the country for the United Nations Special Rapporteur on torture.

Crime is a major problem, exacerbated by a significant methamphetamine trade.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

LGBT+ people face discrimination in employment and access to healthcare. Bainimarama was criticized for making prejudiced remarks against LGBT+ people.

Women experience discrimination in employment as well, and a gender pay gap persists.

Relations between Indigenous Fijians and Indo-Fijians remain strained. Indigenous Fijians previously enjoyed legal advantages in education and political representation. However, the interim government installed after the 2006 coup removed many of these privileges in a bid to foster a sense of national unity.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Citizens enjoy the freedom to travel, live, work, and seek education inside and outside the country. However, the law gives the government broad powers to restrict both internal and foreign travel. Substantial restrictions on movement were imposed in 2021 in response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights are generally respected. However, it is difficult to obtain land titles. The government amended the Land Sales Act in 2014 to require foreign nationals who fail to build a dwelling on their land within two years of acquisition to pay a fine equivalent to 10 percent of the land value every six months. Under the law, urban residential freehold land cannot be sold to foreigners.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Domestic violence remains a problem in Fiji, and perpetrators who are convicted of the crime often receive light sentences. According to the Fiji Women's Crisis Center, there was a spike in domestic violence cases during the government's lockdown in 2020, implemented to prevent the spread of COVID-19.

There is a growing movement in support of marriage equality in Fiji. A transgender woman, Divina Loloma, contested the December 2022 general election for the NFP.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Human trafficking, including sex trafficking of children, remained a problem in 2022. The US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report reported that Fiji "does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so." However, trafficking convictions remain rare, with only two recorded in the country since 2014. Safety standards at workplaces are not always adequately enforced. Long work hours are common in some jobs, including transportation and shipping.

Finland

Population: 5,600,000
Capital: Helsinki
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Finland's parliamentary system features free and fair elections and robust multiparty competition. Corruption is not a significant problem, and freedoms of speech, religion, and association are respected. The judiciary is independent under the constitution and in practice. Women and ethnic minority groups enjoy equal rights, though harassment, hate speech, and discrimination aimed at religious, racial, and ethnic minority groups does occur.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Following significant pressure both in Finland and internationally, in September the government presented proposed legislation that would allow transgender and intersex people to more easily amend their legally recognized gender.
- In June, Finland's parliament passed a bill, which will take effect in the beginning of 2023, that redefines rape as any nonconsensual sexual act. The previous definition required violence or the threat of violence for a sexual act to be considered rape.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, whose role is mainly ceremonial, is directly elected for up to two six-year terms. In 2018, former finance minister and incumbent president Sauli Niinistö, originally of the center-right National Coalition Party (KOK), won a second presidential term with 62.6 percent of the vote, defeating several challengers. The election was considered broadly free and fair.

The prime minister, the head of government, is selected by Finland's freely elected parliament. Following parliamentary elections in April 2019, Antti Rinne of the Social Democratic Party became prime minister in June. However, he resigned due to criticism within the governing coalition over his handling of a postal workers' strike in November 2019, and Sanna Marin was chosen by the party to replace him in December 2019.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Representatives in the 200-seat, unicameral parliament, the Eduskunta, are elected to serve four-year terms. Prior to the 2019 elections, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) expressed "a high level of confidence in all the aspects of the electoral process" and concluded that it was not necessary to send an election observation mission.

The Social Democratic Party won the largest share of the vote, taking 40 seats. The right-wing Finns Party placed second with 39 seats. The new government formed in June 2019 comprised the Social Democratic Party, the Center Party with 31 seats, the Green League with 20 seats, the Left Alliance with 16 seats, and the Swedish People's Party of Finland with 9 seats. The remainder of seats went to KOK, which took 38, the Christian Democrats with 5, the new Movement Now with 1, and the Åland Coalition, also with 1.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Finland's electoral laws are robust and generally well implemented by the relevant authorities.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on political parties' ability to organize and operate, and they compete freely in practice.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Finland regularly experiences peaceful transfers of power between rival political parties through elections, with governments typically consisting of multiparty coalitions.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from undue interference by forces that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Citizens from the Finnish majority and all ethnic minorities enjoy full political rights. The Åland Islands—an autonomous region located off the southwestern coast whose inhabitants speak Swedish—have their own 30-seat parliament, as well as one seat in the national legislature. The Sámi of northern Finland, an Indigenous people who number about 10,000, have a legislature with limited powers, but they do not have guaranteed representation in the parliament. Members of the Sámi community continue to call for greater inclusion in political decision-making processes.

Women and women's interests are reasonably well represented in politics, as are LGBT+ people and their respective interests. Prime Minister Marin is the third woman to serve as Finland's head of government. Her installation also marked the first time that all parties in a Finnish governing coalition were headed by women.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Finland's freely elected government and lawmakers are generally able to develop and implement policy without undue interference from unelected entities.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Corruption is not a significant problem in Finland and is generally punished under relevant laws when discovered. In December 2020, the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) reported that Finland had only fully implemented 1 of its 14 recommended anticorruption efforts.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Laws permitting access to public information are generally well enforced, though there are some limits on the disclosure of information related to national security, foreign affairs, trade secrets, and criminal investigations. All citizens, including government officials, are required by law to make public asset declarations, though there are no penalties for noncompliance. While companies perceive corruption risks and favoritism within public procurement as low, informal networks and personal associations, notably at the local level, are still believed to hold influence over procurement decisions.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 60 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of expression is protected by Article 12 of the constitution and the 2003 Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media. Media outlets in Finland are typically independent and free from political pressure or censorship, and the media environment is strong.

In March 2022, parliament approved an amendment to the Finnish Broadcasting Company (YLE) law requiring the public service broadcaster to include video or audio with text-only news articles, reducing public access to free, quality journalism. A citizen petition against the law was not considered.

Journalists sometimes face harassment for their work, notably those who cover topics related to immigrants and immigration. Journalists also face the risk of defamation charges. In April 2019, investigative reporter Johanna Vehkoo was convicted of defaming a far-right politician and ordered to pay more than $7,000 in fines and compensation. The Finnish Supreme Court acquitted Vehkoo of the charges in January 2022, further strengthening Finland's support of freedom of expression.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is guaranteed in the constitution and generally respected in practice.

However, far-right hate speech and incidents of vandalism directed at the Jewish and Muslim communities are ongoing concerns. Police note that religious discrimination remains a motivating factor for hate crimes.

In March 2022, the Helsinki District Court ruled in favor of Päivi Räsänen, a Finnish parliamentarian who was charged with spreading hate speech about the LGBT+ community. The court stated that her religiously based comments did not violate freedom of speech laws.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are few impediments to personal expression, and the authorities are not known to engage in improper surveillance of personal communications.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected by law and upheld in practice.

In October 2020, police used pepper spray against protesters obstructing traffic, who were associated with the environmental activist group Extinction Rebellion and calling on the government to take more significant measures to combat the climate crisis. Seven police officers were charged in connection with the incident in June 2022.

As of early 2022, 48 protesters were being investigated for invasion of public premises.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate without restriction.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to organize and bargain collectively, though public-sector workers who provide services deemed essential may not strike. Approximately 75 percent of workers belong to trade unions, which actively advocate for members' interests. In September, parliament passed the Patient Safety Act, which restricts nurses' right to strike. It nearly led to mass resignations within the nursing sector, and suggests attempts to restrict the right to organize within some sectors.

F. RULE OF LAW: 16 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, and the courts operate without political interference in practice.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Due process is generally respected in Finland. Authorities largely uphold safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention and provide the conditions for fair trials.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

There are few significant threats to physical security, and violent crime is uncommon, although it has increased in recent years.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees the Sámi people cultural autonomy and the right to pursue their culturally significant livelihoods, which include fishing and reindeer herding. However, representatives of the community have said that they cannot fully exercise their rights in practice and face restrictions on land use. In April 2022, the Finnish Supreme Court dismissed two ongoing cases against the Finnish Sámi people that claimed they were violating Finnish fishing rules. The court ruled in favor of the Sámi people's constitutional right to practice their traditional fishing culture.

Women enjoy equal legal rights but suffer from pay discrimination.

A June 2019 report by the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) noted an increase in racist and intolerant hate speech in Finland, especially toward Muslims and refugees. Hate speech on the internet was also a concern, with targets including immigrants, people of African descent, LGBT+ people, the Jewish community, and Roma. ECRI's recommendations had not been implemented as of March 2022. From mid-2021 to mid-2022, Finnish authorities appointed a working group to assess the need for reforms to the Non-Discrimination Act. A proposal for strengthening the Non-Discrimination Act was presented to Finland's parliament in September 2022 and a partial amendment was approved in November.

A 2020 report by Finland's nondiscrimination ombudsman highlighted racism against people of African descent. In September 2021, the Finnish Ministry of Justice and the Equality Commissioner launched a campaign encouraging people to take action against racism.

A July 2022 report on equality by the nondiscrimination ombudsman highlighted that many people still experience discrimination in Finland, most notably based on disability and ethnic origin.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals in Finland are free to travel abroad and domestically. The country has one of the most expansive "freedom to roam" policies in the world, allowing people to use any public or private land for recreational purposes so long as the privacy of a private residence is not violated, and no environmental damage is incurred. There are no undue restrictions on people's ability to change their place of residence, education, or employment.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Intellectual and property rights are upheld. There are no major obstacles to establishing a business, and the country boasts a well-regulated, transparent, and open economy.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

People's choices on personal status matters are for the most part unrestricted. Same-sex marriage has been allowed since 2017. However, legislation requires that transgender people be sterilized and have a mental health diagnosis in order to obtain legal recognition of their gender. In 2017, the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) called for Finland to eliminate these impediments to legal gender recognition. The ECRI echoed this call in 2019. In early 2022, Prime Minister Marin said that the government would vote on a bill to overturn these requirements later in the year, and in September the government submitted a proposal for an act addressing the legal recognition of gender.

Legislation permitting in vitro fertilization and artificial insemination was enacted in 2007, but surrogacy remains illegal for both opposite and same-sex couples.

The government submitted a proposal to reform the section of the criminal code that addresses sexual offenses to define rape as a nonconsensual act and it was adopted by the parliament in June 2022. However, there are complaints that sexual offenses are not properly investigated by the police. Rates of violence against women remain high. There are not substantial frameworks or procedures to address domestic violence, nor long-term support for survivors. A March 2022 Amnesty International report found that less than half of all municipalities have gender-based violence prevention programs.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

The authorities generally uphold protections against exploitative working conditions. Asylum seekers and migrants are most vulnerable to sex and labor trafficking. The government actively prosecutes trafficking offenses, and survivors have access to protection and assistance. However, alleged perpetrators often receive lighter charges and penalties due to lack of specialized training for investigators. The US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report assigned Finland Tier 1 status, its highest ranking, noting that Finland continued to investigate and convict more traffickers.

France

Population: 65,800,000
Capital: Paris
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The French political system features vibrant democratic processes and generally strong protections for civil liberties and political rights. However, successive governments have responded to terrorist attacks and the COVID-19 pandemic by curtailing constitutional protections and empowering law enforcement to infringe upon personal freedoms. The government has also imposed states of emergency in recent years, enabling it to infringe on rights to privacy, assembly, and movement.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In April, President Emmanuel Macron won reelection, defeating far-right candidate Marine Le Pen. The second round of the election saw an abstention rate of 28 percent, a figure not seen since 1969.
- In the June parliamentary elections, the pro-Macron Ensemble! (Together!) coalition won the most seats but fell short of a majority. A left-wing alliance won 131 seats, while the Le Pen–led National Front (FN) won 89.

- A bill enshrining the constitutional right to an abortion passed the parliament's lower house in November and awaited senatorial approval at year's end.
- In December, the government revealed legislation that would restrict rejected asylum seekers' ability to appeal denials of their claims, among other things. Parliament is expected to debate the bill in 2023.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is chief of state, and is elected to five-year terms by direct, universal suffrage in a two-round system. Executive elections are considered free and fair. Incumbent Emmanuel Macron won 27.9 percent of the first-round vote in April 2022, while Marine Le Pen of the far-right FN won 23.2 percent. Macron won 58.6 percent and a second term in the second round in late April. The 28 percent second-round abstention rate was the highest seen for such a contest since 1969.

The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the president. Labor Minister Élisabeth Borne was named premier in May 2022 and remained in office at year's end.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the lower house of Parliament, the 577-seat National Assembly, are elected to five-year terms in a two-round system. The upper house, the 348-seat Senate, is an indirectly elected body whose members serve six-year terms.

In the June 2022 parliamentary elections, Ensemble! won 245 lower-house seats, falling short of an absolute majority. The New Ecological and Social People's Union (NUPES), a four-party left-wing coalition, won 131. The far-right FN won 89, a major improvement over the 8 seats it won in 2017.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

France's electoral laws and framework are fair and implemented impartially.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

Parties are generally able to organize and operate freely.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The Republican and Socialist parties dominated French politics in the early 2010s. Other parties and new alliances like Ensemble! and NUPES, which includes the Socialist Party in its coalition, have since gained more visibility.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination. However, some media outlets have drawn outsized attention to controversial political personalities, potentially skewing public perception for economic gain.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

No laws restrict the political participation of women, LGBT+ people, and other marginalized groups. However, far-right parties and nationalist ideologies have become more mainstream and emboldened racist commentary in public discourse.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government. However, the government has consistently used Article 49.3 of the constitution to enact legislation that is defeated in Parliament; under Article 49.3, a government can force passage of a bill and must withstand a no-confidence vote within 24 hours of employing that maneuver. The article's use is restricted for some legislation but not for certain financial proposals; governments during the Macron presidency have used Article 49.3 on a regular basis.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

A 2017 law aims to reduce conflicts of interest. Despite this, corruption cases increased by 28 percent between 2016 and 2021 according to government data. In most cases, officials have resigned or been dismissed from office.

In a March 2022 report, the Senate criticized the presidency and other public agencies for signing lucrative contracts with consulting firms. Senators specifically accused one firm, McKinsey, of paying no corporate taxes within France despite staff members testifying otherwise.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government generally operates with openness and transparency, though it has increasingly used Article 49.3 of the constitution to enact policy with limited debate or scrutiny.

In July 2022, a former executive at ride-hailing service Uber leaked exchanges between Uber staff and Macron, then the economy minister, between 2014 and 2016. In those exchanges, Macron offered to reform French law to assist its operations despite the then ruling Socialist government's opposition to some of Uber's activity.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 51 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The media generally operate freely and represent a wide range of political opinions, though journalists have faced violence in the course of their work.

Under the 2021 Global Security Law (LGS), journalists do not enjoy exceptions in circumstances where police officers order the dispersal of protests.

In 2019, Paris prosecutors ordered a raid of Mediapart's offices after the outlet published remarks made by a former Macron aide. In July 2022, a court ruled that the raid was "neither necessary in a democratic society, nor proportionate to the objective sought" and ordered the government to pay Mediapart one euro along with a separate fine.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of religion. Antidefamation laws penalize religiously motivated abuse, and Holocaust denial is illegal. The government maintains the policy of laïcité (secularism), whereby religion and state affairs are strictly separated. However, senior officials and politicians have engaged in antisemitic and Islamophobic rhetoric in the public sphere.

The state has placed Muslim organizations under greater scrutiny. The 2021 Law Reinforcing the Republican Principles (LRPR) allows the government to dissolve religious organizations, increases the surveillance of mosques and Muslim associations, and requires the latter to sign a contract of "respect for Republican values" when applying for state subsidies.

Muslim women are subject to several laws preventing them from wearing clothing related to their religious practice or identity. In February 2022, authorities in Paris banned a march of female football players wearing the hijab.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no formal restrictions on academic freedom in France.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Though citizens are free to express their views publicly, the government's surveillance and tracking of individuals based on their political views has raised concerns in recent years.

The use of facial recognition is largely banned in public spaces with some exceptions. In May 2022, Nice mayor Christian Estrosi called on the National Commission for Information and Freedoms, a government body, to allow greater use of recognition technology, citing public safety concerns.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is normally respected, though authorities have used excessive force when dealing with political protests in recent years.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) generally operate freely. However, the LGS and LRPR have complicated and obstructed NGO reports around protests and police actions.

The LRPR eased authorities' ability to disband associations that allegedly disrespect so-called "values of the Republic." The law has been used to target organizations that seek to combat Islamophobia.

In March 2022, the interior minister ordered the dissolution of the Antifacist Group of Lyon and Surroundings (GALE), saying that it meant to incite violence. In May, however, the Council of State suspended that decision, citing a lack of evidence that GALE intended to disturb public order. In September, the prefect of Vienne cited the LRPR when calling on authorities in the city of Poitiers to withdraw public funding from Alternatiba, an environmental NGO; Alternatiba planned to hold workshops on civil disobedience. The mayor declined, prompting the prefect to sue over the legality of the funding in October.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions are generally free to operate without undue restrictions. Social movements like the Yellow Vests of the late 2010s—despite rejecting affiliations with trade unions or political parties—and the formation of NUPES have provided momentum for trade union activism. In October 2022, oil workers, rail workers, and civil servants held strikes over pay, disrupting domestic travel.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

France has an independent judiciary. The rule of law generally prevails in court proceedings.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process generally prevails in civil and criminal matters.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

The number of complaints of police violence sent to the police's internal disciplinary body has sharply increased since 2018, as have suspicions that the body is too lenient. Since the passage of a 2017 law governing police officers' use of firearms, police have increasingly shot and killed individuals over reported noncompliance with their instructions. Police officers reportedly killed 13 people in traffic stops after such reported noncompliance in 2022.

In late December 2022, three people were killed in a racist attack against a Kurdish community center in Paris. Authorities said there was no immediate indication of a "terrorist motive," prompting Kurdish community leaders to call on the government to call the attack a terrorist incident.

Both Islamophobia and antisemitism have increased in recent years. The far-right has become increasingly successful in using racist language to shape French public discourse.

Women face a notable pay gap, with European Union data showing that men earn 15.8 percent more than women on average in France. Sexual harassment of and violence against women are prominent issues.

Migrants and refugees continue to face societal discrimination and abuse from authorities, though Ukrainians fleeing the Russian regime's invasion of their country have received support. Migrants and aid workers in Calais have faced mistreatment by police; while the Office for Immigration and Integration vowed to better address the needs of people living in informal camps, NGOs reported little improvement in Calais in 2022.

In December 2022, the government revealed draft immigration legislation that would, among other things, limit the number of appeals available to rejected asylum seekers and allow authorities to more easily deport foreign-born individuals convicted of crimes. Parliament is expected to debate the bill in 2023.

In September 2022, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that the government's decision not to repatriate French women and children held in Syria violated their rights; the women and children had been affiliated with the Islamic State militant group and were subsequently held in camps in Syria.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are normally no restrictions on freedom of travel or choice of residence or employment. COVID-19-related restrictions, criticized for their discriminatory enforcement, came to an end in August 2022.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Private businesses are free to operate.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individuals generally enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family. A bill enshrining the constitutional right to an abortion passed the lower house in November 2022 and awaited senatorial approval at year's end. Fertility treatments are available for single women and lesbian couples; however, transgender individuals are not included, and surrogacy remains illegal.

During the 2020 and 2021 COVID-19 lockdowns, reports of domestic violence rose sharply, despite government measures to prevent this. Authorities implemented mechanisms to report violence and create safe zones, but their effectiveness is unclear.

Muslim women's freedom to control their appearance is affected by several laws. While so-called "burkinis" are largely banned in public pools, the city council of Grenoble allowed their use in a contentious May 2022 vote.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Employment discrimination against women, French Muslims, immigrants of North African descent, and other marginalized groups hinders equality of opportunity. While the government acts against human trafficking, the problem persists in the commercial sex trade; some victims are also forced into domestic labor.

Gabon

Population: 2,400,000
Capital: Libreville
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Although Gabon holds multiparty elections, President Ali Bongo Ondimba maintains political dominance through a combination of patronage and repression, having succeeded his father, Omar, upon his death in 2009 after more than 40 years in power. President Bongo's fitness to exercise power has been the subject of considerable doubt since he suffered a stroke in 2018. The executive branch effectively controls the judiciary. Other significant problems include discrimination against immigrants, marginalization of minority groups, and legal and de facto inequality for women.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In March, President Bongo announced his intention to run for reelection in 2023.
- Between late March and early April, French authorities charged four of the late Omar Bongo's children were charged with embezzlement, while another five were charged in July. French authorities suspect the Bongo family of securing real estate in that country using ill-gotten gains.

- In September, opposition leader Guy Nzouba-Ndama, who is considered a potential presidential candidate, was arrested at Gabon's border with the Republic of the Congo after allegedly carrying 1.2 billion Central African francs ($1.9 million) in undeclared money. Gabonese authorities accused Nzouba-Ndama of money laundering later that month.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40 (−1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is elected by popular vote for seven-year terms. Presidential term limits were abolished in 2003.

The August 2016 presidential election pitted incumbent Ali Bongo Ondimba of the Gabonese Democratic Party (PDG) against Jean Ping of the opposition Union of Forces for Change (UFC). The electoral commission declared Bongo the winner with 49.8 percent of the vote. In Haut-Ogooué Province, a Bongo family stronghold, the commission claimed a turnout rate of 99.9 percent, with 95 percent for Bongo, even though turnout in the rest of Gabon was 54 percent. Both Ping and observers from the European Union called for a recount.

Meanwhile, violent protests erupted, and security forces stormed Ping's headquarters. Although the government claimed the death toll from the unrest was under 10 people, journalists and opposition leaders estimated that more than 50 had died; hundreds were arrested.

The Constitutional Court, headed by a longtime Bongo family ally, rebuffed an observation mission from the African Union during the recount. Following the recount, the president was credited with 50.7 percent of the vote, which Ping rejected.

Bongo suffered a stroke in 2018 and was not seen publicly for nearly a year. Since then, his capacity to serve has been repeatedly questioned.

The president nominates and can dismiss the prime minister at will. Then defense minister Rose Christiane Ossouka Raponda was named prime minister in July 2020.

Gabon's Parliament consists of the 143-seat National Assembly, whose members are elected by popular vote for five-year terms, and the 67-seat Senate. Some 52 senators are directly elected, while 15 are appointed by the president. The Senate was reformed by 2020 constitutional amendments as part of the PDG's efforts to consolidate control should Bongo be further incapacitated. Bongo appointed his share of senators in February 2021, days after the PDG claimed 45 of the body's elected seats.

National Assembly elections were originally due in 2016 but were repeatedly postponed. The incumbent lower house was finally dissolved in 2018, leaving the Senate as the only legislative body for most of that year. The PDG claimed 98 seats in the October 2018 National Assembly elections, which were boycotted by opposition parties due to the government's failure to create an independent electoral commission. PDG allies won roughly 10 more seats, and no other party took more than 11. The elections were marked by credible allegations of fraud and repression.

Gabon's electoral laws and framework do not ensure credible elections. The electoral commission, the Interior Ministry, and the Constitutional Court all play important roles in managing elections, and all are loyal to Bongo.

In 2018, Parliament gave its final approval to constitutional amendments that were developed without meaningful input from opposition parties or civil society. Those amendments introduced a runoff system for presidential elections if no candidate secures a first-round majority. Lawmakers rejected the imposition of presidential term limits. Under the 2020 constitutional amendments, the Senate's size was reduced and the president was allowed to appoint 15 of its members. The amendments were regarded as a means of consolidating PDG control.

The mandate of the members of the Gabonese Election Center (CGE), a body that organizes elections, was affected by the COVID-19 pandemic, with the Constitutional Court extending those mandates in June 2020. Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and political parties later argued that the CGE was functioning illegally, however. In an October 2022 ruling, the Constitutional Court called for the body's renewal.

Opposition parties unsuccessfully sought to trigger a reform of the electoral code, which they believe favors the government, in 2022.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The PDG dominates the nominally multiparty system. Opposition parties remain fragmented, and the government has disrupted their activities by denying them permits for public gatherings, arresting participants in their largely peaceful protests, and incarcerating their leaders.

In 2019, a Libreville court handed Bertrand Zibi Abeghe, a former ally turned opposition leader arrested during the 2016 election, a six-year prison sentence; he was released in September 2022.

In 2021, the government proposed a new law that would require presidential candidates to have lived in Gabon for at least six months in each of the two years preceding an election. The law reportedly targets members of the Bongo family who might contest the 2023 election against the president.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The PDG has monopolized the executive branch since the 1960s, and there is no realistic opportunity for the opposition to gain power through elections. Ping, who called for a civil disobedience campaign over the 2016 presidential election, boycotted the 2018 National Assembly elections along with other opposition leaders.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The Bongo family and associates have acquired enormous wealth after decades in power, which has led to judicial investigations in France. The 2021 release of the Pandora Papers, an investigation that focused on corruption in the global financial system, revealed that the Bongo family used substantial resources to sustain patronage networks and fund vote-buying during elections. The leadership relies on security forces to intimidate the opposition.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Ethnic minorities have little ability to gain political representation, given the PDG's dominance. Key government and military posts are held by loyalists from major ethnic groups. Though Parliament decriminalized homosexuality in 2020, LGBT+ people are not openly represented politically.

Women are also underrepresented, holding only 14.7 percent of National Assembly seats as of December 2022. Ossouka Raponda, who remained in post at year's end, is Gabon's first female premier.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12 (−1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Government policy is set by the president and senior aides, and Parliament is dominated by the PDG. In November 2018, a month after Bongo suffered a stroke, the Constitutional Court unilaterally altered the constitution to allow the vice president to assume some of the president's functions if he is "temporarily unavailable." In 2020, Parliament passed further constitutional amendments stipulating that the president of the Senate, the president of the National Assembly, and the defense minister would share interim executive powers should the president become incapacitated.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4 (−1)

Corruption and impunity remain major problems. Authorities have repeatedly used anticorruption efforts to target regime opponents. A special criminal court for cases involving the theft of public funds was established in 2018, but prosecutions remain selective.

Members of the Bongo family have been accused of corrupt behavior, which was also uncovered by the Pandora Papers. In 2020, NGOs filed a lawsuit in Libreville accusing Noureddin Bongo, the president's son, of corruption and money laundering. The public prosecutor dismissed the complaint. Noureddin is directing his father's 2023 reelection campaign.

French prosecutors suspect that Elf Aquitaine—a French energy firm that has since been absorbed into the present-day Total SA—had provided "undue commissions" to the Bongo family to access the country's oil reserves; family members allegedly used those proceeds to acquire real estate in France. Between March and April 2022, four of Omar Bongo's children were charged with embezzlement in France. Another five were charged in July.

In 2022, NGOs accused the government of embezzling donor-provided COVID-19 relief funds. In June, a group of civil society leaders said that the government was blocking the publication of an audit on coronavirus-related spending.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because French authorities charged multiple members of the Bongo family with embezzlement.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government operates with minimal transparency. The presidency's budget is not subject to the same oversight as those for other institutions. High-level civil servants are required to disclose their assets, but the declarations are not made public. The government has not been transparent about President Bongo's health.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 18 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Press freedom is guaranteed by law but is restricted in practice. Reporters self-censor to avoid legal repercussions.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Although religious freedom is constitutionally enshrined and generally respected, some heterodox religious groups reportedly have difficulty obtaining registration from the government.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Omar Bongo University, Gabon's main center for tertiary education, is state-run, and academic freedom is tenuous. Professors self-censor to avoid conflicts with the authorities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Ordinary individuals' freedom to express criticism of the government is limited by restrictive laws and deterred by state surveillance. Individuals who criticize the government are routinely detained or attacked by security forces.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedom of assembly is limited. The government has repeatedly denied permits for meetings, used tear gas, and arrested demonstrators to disperse unauthorized gatherings. A 2017 law further limited the freedom to assemble by making organizers responsible for offenses committed during gatherings. In May 2022, authorities stopped protesters from rallying against the presence of French troops in the country.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Relatively few NGOs operate in Gabon. Freedom of association is guaranteed by the constitution, but the process for formally registering NGOs is onerous and implemented inconsistently, leaving groups vulnerable to accusations that they are not in compliance with the law.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Workers are legally permitted to join unions, engage in collective bargaining, and strike, but the government has disrupted sit-ins and other labor activism in recent years, and has arrested participants.

In February 2022, civil-service union leader Jean-Rémy Yama was blocked from leaving the country and was detained by the Gabonese intelligence service. In early March, Yama was handed politically motivated corruption charges. Yama, who was forced out of the civil service in late March, remained in detention at year's end.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The courts are subordinate to the president. The judiciary is accountable to the Justice Ministry, through which the president has the power to appoint and dismiss judges. Gabon's highest judicial body, the Constitutional Court, is composed of three members appointed by the president, two by the National Assembly, one by the Senate, and three by the Superior Council of the Judiciary (CSM), which itself is headed by the president and justice minister.

The 2018 constitution created a new special court, the Court of Justice of the Republic, which alone has the authority to place a check on top executive and judicial officials. It consists of seven members appointed by the CSM and six members of Parliament. The Constitutional Court is headed by a longtime Bongo ally.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention are not upheld by police, and detainees are often denied access to lawyers. Lengthy pretrial detention is common. Arbitrary arrests linked to opposition activism have increased since the 2016 election crisis. Several detained opposition figures have been denied due process, and prisoners have occasionally died in custody. Civil society leaders are routinely denied access to political prisoners.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Prisons are overcrowded, with limited access to proper medical care. Torture is outlawed by the constitution, but detainees and inmates face physical abuse.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

The country's large population of African immigrants is subject to harassment and extortion, including by police. Members of some minority groups experience workplace discrimination and live in extreme poverty.

Women have equal legal rights on some issues but face significant de facto discrimination in employment and other economic matters. Sexual harassment in the workplace, which is not prohibited by law, is common.

While homosexuality was decriminalized in 2020, same-sex marriage remains illegal and LGBT+ individuals still face widespread social stigma, discrimination, and the threat of physical violence.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

There are no laws restricting internal travel, but police often monitor travelers at checkpoints and demand bribes. Married women seeking to obtain a passport or travel abroad must have permission from their husbands. The government has imposed travel bans on opposition leaders in recent years.

In February 2022, union leader Jean-Rémy Yama was blocked from leaving Gabon before being accused of corruption. In September, opposition leader Guy Nzouba-Ndama was arrested at Gabon's border with the Republic of the Congo after gendarmes allegedly found 1.2 billion Central African francs ($1.9 million) in undeclared money in his luggage. Gabonese authorities accused Nzouba-Ndama of money laundering later that month.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Bureaucratic and judicial delays can pose difficulties for businesses. Enforcement of contracts and property rights is weak, and the process for property registration is lengthy. Bongo and his associates play a dominant role in the economy, impairing fair competition and favoring those with connections to the leadership.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Personalized forms of violence are believed to be widespread, and perpetrators generally enjoy impunity. Rape and domestic abuse are rarely reported to authorities or prosecuted. Spousal rape is not specifically prohibited. Abortion is a punishable crime under most circumstances. The minimum age for marriage is 15 for women and 18 for men. The civil code states that a wife must obey her husband as the head of household.

In 2021, Parliament amended the civil code to enhance legal equality for married women, including by recognizing gender-based violence as legitimate grounds for divorce.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Wage standards and laws against forced labor are poorly enforced, particularly in the informal sector and with respect to foreign workers. Both adults and children are exploited in a number of different occupations, and foreign women are trafficked to Gabon for prostitution or domestic servitude.

Georgia

Population: 3,700,000
Capital: Tbilisi
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which are examined in separate reports. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology.

Overview: Georgia holds regular competitive elections and hosts lively media and civil society sectors. However, oligarchic influence affects the country's political affairs. Corruption in government persists and media freedom is undermined by intimidation and pressure against journalists. Executive and legislative interference in the courts remains a substantial problem, as does a lack of transparency and professionalism surrounding judicial proceedings.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- The full-scale Russian military invasion of Ukraine dominated political discourse during the year. Georgian leaders offered mixed messages about support for Ukraine; for example, the prime minister announced that Georgia would not join sanctions against Russia, even as the National Bank enforced the sanctions. A significant influx of Russian migrants crossed the border into Georgia during the year.
- Together with Ukraine and Moldova, Georgia applied for European Union (EU) membership. The government established parliamentary committees to work on qualifications needed for candidate status; civil society representatives were excluded from the process.

- In July, former deputy director of the State Security Service of Georgia Ioseb Gogashvili publicly accused the ruling Georgian Dream (GD) party of interfering with past elections by illegally offering pardons, lighter sentences, and opportunities to skip military service in exchange for votes. The country's top watchdog groups said documents Gogashvili had provided to them supported the claims. Police raided Gogashvili's home and arrested him soon after he went public with the allegations, and charged him with leaking state secrets and illegal possession of firearms.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 22 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The prime minister serves as head of government and the president serves as head of state. Under constitutional changes approved in 2017, the president elected in 2018 is to serve a six-year term, after which a 300-member electoral college comprising national lawmakers and regional and local officials will choose presidents.

In 2018, Salome Zourabichvili, a former foreign minister supported by the Georgian Dream (GD) party, won about 60 percent of the vote in the second round of the presidential election, defeating Grigol Vashadze, a former foreign minister running for the opposition United National Movement (UNM). While the electoral environment was largely peaceful, significant preelectoral issues and voter intimidation on election day marred the quality of the runoff. Abuse of administrative resources and limited instances of vote buying and ballot-box stuffing were reported. GD activists created an intimidating atmosphere outside many voting stations. Just days before the runoff, a charitable foundation controlled by former prime minister Bidzina Ivanishvili, then the GD chairman, promised to write off the debts of about one in six eligible voters.

In 2022, the International Society for Fair Elections And Democracy (ISFED) and the Georgian branch of Transparency International (TI), citing documents provided by the former deputy director of the State Security Service of Georgia, accused GD of illegal offering pardons and improperly pressuring state employees to the degree that it may have influenced the outcome of the 2018 presidential election and the 2020 parliamentary elections.

The president formally appoints the prime minister, whom Parliament nominates. Giorgi Gakharia, the prime minister since late 2019, resigned in February 2021, objecting to the arrest of UNM leader Nika Melia. Gakharia was succeeded by defense minister and former prime minister Irakli Gharibashvili.

The unicameral Parliament is composed of 150 members, with 120 selected through nationwide proportional representation and 30 directly elected in single-member districts. This system was introduced in 2020; previously, nearly half of lawmakers were elected in single-member districts. All members serve four-year terms.

In the October 2020 parliamentary elections and November runoffs, GD won 90 seats, including all 30 single-member district seats. The UNM-led coalition won 36 seats, all via proportional representation, and 7 smaller groups won the remaining seats. Opposition parties boycotted the runoff, and voter turnout for that election round stood at 26 percent, the lowest recorded since independence. Opposition members who were elected declined to take their seats until an agreement between the government and opposition was brokered with the support of European Council (EC) president Charles Michel in April 2021. GD withdrew from the agreement in July 2021, however. By the end of 2022 most politicians had taken their seats.

Election observers including the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) considered the October 2020 vote competitive but noted numerous shortcomings, including ruling-party dominance in election commissions; voting stations crowded by party-affiliated observer groups, mostly linked to GD; campaign-finance rules that disadvantaged new and small parties; and highly polarized and nonanalytic media coverage. Additional claims of electoral malpractice benefitting the GD in the 2020 elections emerged in 2022 via a leak of documents from the former deputy director of the State Security Service.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The country's electoral laws are generally fair, and the bodies that implement them have typically done so impartially. However, GD's dominance in precinct-level commissions has complicated complaints procedures, and short timelines for filing complaints impair election quality.

New candidates for the Central Election Commission (CEC) were presented to parliament in August 2022, but at year's end lawmakers had failed to vote on their candidacy, in violation of legally defined timeframes.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 8 / 16

While Georgia hosts a dynamic multiparty system, opposition parties can face barriers to political competition, including legal and other harassment.

In 2019, the bankers Mamuka Khazaradze and Badri Japaridze were charged with money laundering two weeks after Khazaradze stated his intention to form a political party. (The party won four seats in the 2020 parliamentary elections.) The pair were convicted of fraud in January 2022 and handed seven-year prison sentences. However, a court commuted the sentences, saying the statute of limitations for fraud had expired.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4

Georgia last underwent a transfer of power between rival groups in 2012–13, when GD defeated the UNM in parliamentary and presidential elections. A faction of the UNM split off in 2017, leaving smaller parties that are less capable of mounting a credible challenge.

Voter intimidation and vote-buying activities inhibit the ability of opposition parties to gain power via elections. Opposition parties and members experienced significant intimidation and harassment in 2021. UNM leader Melia was arrested in February 2021 on charges related to antigovernment protests held in 2019, though he was released from pretrial detention in May. In September 2022, the television channel Pirveli, which is critical of the government, leaked documents its journalists said showed surveillance activity by the State Security Service of Georgia (SSG) against the UNM and other opposition parties.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Recent elections have featured allegations of various forms of vote buying and intimidation, including pressure on public employees and recipients of social benefits to support the ruling party. Wealthy unelected figures such as GD founder Bidzina Ivanishvili exert significant political influence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

No laws prevent women or members of ethnic and religious minority groups from participating in politics. Electoral reforms introduced in 2020 included a gender quota for the proportional-representation component of parliamentary elections; at least one in every four candidates on a party's list must be a woman. Nevertheless, women remain underrepresented at all levels of government. Although a woman became president in 2018, women won only 31 seats in the 2020 parliamentary elections.

Ethnic minority groups make up an estimated 13 percent of the population, with ethnic Armenians and Azerbaijanis forming the largest communities. However, few parliamentarians are members of ethnic minority groups.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The ability of elected officials to determine and implement government policy has been impaired by the informal role of so-called oligarchs, including Ivanishvili, who has exerted significant influence over decision-making since leaving office.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption persists in form of nepotism and cronyism in government hiring and procurement. The lack of independence among law enforcement bodies and the judiciary impedes the effective application of anticorruption laws. Successful cases against high-ranking officials and those close to them remain rare. The State Inspector's Service, a key body responsible for investigating official corruption, was disbanded in late 2021, with the initiative launched in the parliament as its outspoken leader was on maternity leave. An anticorruption body proposed in parliament in 2022 by GD was criticized by the opposition and good-governance groups over appointment procedures that failed to guarantee independence from the ruling party.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Government operations are generally subject to scrutiny by auditing bodies, the media, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and the public. However, access to public information remains uneven. While public officials declare assets, the Georgia chapter of Transparency International warned in 2020 that the monitoring of such declarations is inconsistent and does not focus on conflicts of interest or potential corruption.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 36 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The media environment is pluralistic but highly partisan. Although free expression is broadly allowed, the government is often aggressive toward critical journalists, and has pressured unfriendly media outlets.

Formula TV faces a potential government takeover, as its partial owner and former defense minister Davit Kezerashvili has been sued for reparations to the Ministry of Defense over alleged corruption. In May 2022, Nika Gvaramia, head of the opposition television channel Mtavari Arkhi (Main Channel), was imprisoned on charges of abusing his position while working at Rustavi 2 TV station. The charges were widely viewed as politically motivated. Earlier, in January, the father of the founder of Pirveli TV was convicted of money laundering, in a case generally viewed as motivated by material on his son's television station. There continue to be reports of officials denying access to journalists critical of government.

The Ministry of Culture has increasingly been involved in efforts to suppress cultural expression. In 2022, the culture minister was accused of purging cultural institutions of employees for their views, with courts finding in favor of employees in wrongful dismissal lawsuits. The Georgian Film Academy decided not to show a film critical of Ivanishvili, a decision widely believed to be the result of pressure from the ministry.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion but grants unique privileges to the Georgian Orthodox Church. Georgia's religious minorities—among them Jehovah's Witnesses and Muslims—have reported discrimination and hostility, including from Georgian Orthodox priests and adherents.

The State Security Service of Georgia surveilled members of the clergy, according to August 2021 press reports, with agents reportedly tracking their communications with journalists and diplomats as well as their personal activities.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected. However, school principals and teachers regularly face pressure to campaign for the ruling party during elections. Several institutions associated with the Turkish Islamic preacher Fethullah Gülen have faced official pressure or even closure in recent years. (The Turkish government blames Gülen's movement for a 2016 coup attempt in Turkey.)

Georgians generally enjoy freedom of expression, including in their online communications. However, watchdog groups have expressed concerns that state agencies can conduct surveillance and data collection without adequate oversight. In 2022, the powers of security services to engage in surveillance expanded, while checks on surveillance weakened under provisions of a controversial surveillance law.

In August 2021, the State Security Service was revealed to have engaged in widespread surveillance of public figures, including journalists, activists, clergy members, and politicians. Multiple individuals confirmed the authenticity of their conversations after they were leaked.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly is upheld unevenly, with police sometimes responding to demonstrations with excessive force. In 2022, there were large-scale rallies in favor of Georgia's EU membership bid, and against the authorities for their failure to secure EU candidate status.

LGBT+ groups' right to assembly is rarely protected. In July 2021, anti-LGBT+ rioters met little resistance from police when they broke into the offices of Tbilisi Pride, destroying property and attacking journalists. The Pride rally did not take place in 2022.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Civil society is fairly robust. Some groups are included in policy discussions, though others face political pressure including criticism and exclusion from policy dialogue. In December 2022, several parliamentarians proposed a "foreign agents" law that would place extra scrutiny on some civil society groups. In 2021, civil society advocates were revealed to be targets of state surveillance.

In 2022, the Georgian government established parliamentary groups to work on reforms necessary for EU candidacy status, but civil society groups were excluded from these processes.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers are legally allowed to organize, bargain collectively, and strike, though there are some restrictions on the right to strike, including a ban on strikes by certain categories of workers. Legal protections against antiunion discrimination by employers are weak and poorly enforced in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Despite ongoing judicial reforms, executive and legislative interference in the courts remains a substantial problem, as does a lack of transparency and professionalism surrounding judicial proceedings.

The High Council of Justice nominates Supreme Court judges; whom Parliament then approves. A judicial self-governing body elects most council members. Over the past five years, Supreme Court nominations have featured criticism of opaque processes and allegations of unqualified nominees, and consequent boycotts of confirmation votes by opposition lawmakers. In 2022, two judges considered close to the ruling party were elected to the High Council of Justice, following the sudden resignations of two other members. Their election was criticized by opposition parties as reflecting further capture of the judiciary by a small number of influential judges.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

The law guarantees due process, but associated safeguards are not always respected. The ombudsman's office has reported a failure to fully implement Constitutional Court rulings on due process matters, administrative delays in court proceedings, the violation of the accused's right to a presumption of innocence, failure to observe rules surrounding detention and interrogation, and the denial of access to a lawyer upon arrest. Multiple government opponents have faced prosecutions in recent years that were widely seen as selective or politically motivated.

Former president Mikheil Saakashvili, who had been convicted of abuse of power in absentia in 2018, was arrested by Georgian authorities upon his return to Georgia in October 2021. Saakashvili was prohibited from attending several hearings related to new charges in 2021 and 2022.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Human rights watchdogs and the ombudsman have expressed concern about the physical abuse of detainees during arrest and in police custody, and have noted the lack of an independent system for supervising police conduct and addressing claims of mistreatment. Violence and harsh conditions in prisons remain problems.

A 2018 law established the State Inspector's Service (SIS), which was tasked with investigating police abuses. In December 2021, the government passed legislation to replace the SIS with two entities, which the state inspector described as "punishment of the service for its independence."

Former president Saakashvili faced apparent mistreatment after his October 2021 arrest. Not long after he was detained, the State Penitentiary Service (SPS) released footage of Saakashvili being physically dragged into a prison hospital, apparently against his will.

A 2014 law provides protection against discrimination based on various factors, including race, gender, age, sexual orientation, and gender identity, but it is enforced unevenly. Women and people with disabilities frequently experience employment discrimination.

LGBT+ people face societal discrimination and have been targets of serious violence. Transgender people receive little protection, and prosecutors rarely designate crimes against transgender people or other minorities as hate crimes, despite evidence supporting such designations.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are ongoing restrictions on travel to and from the separatist territories of Abkhazia and South Ossetia, and individuals who approach their de facto borders can face detention, generally for short periods. Georgians are otherwise free to travel and change their place of residence, employment, and education without undue interference.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal framework and government policies are generally supportive of private business activity. However, protection for property rights remains weak, and deficiencies in judicial independence and government transparency hamper economic freedom.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally respected. However, constitutional changes approved in 2017 define marriage as "a union between a man and a woman for the purpose of creating a family." There is no law allowing civil unions for same-sex couples.

Domestic violence remains a problem in Georgia, and the response from police is often inadequate, though changing societal attitudes have contributed to more frequent reporting and some improvements in enforcement in recent years. Spousal rape is not specifically criminalized.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Unsafe conditions and inadequate legal protections for workers continue to contribute to a high rate of workplace deaths and injuries. In 2020, Parliament passed a labor reform law that introduced new rules for overtime, shift breaks, and other working conditions, while strengthening the labor inspector's office.

Georgia is a source, destination, and transit country for human trafficking linked to sexual exploitation and forced labor. Displaced people from Abkhazia and South Ossetia are among the populations most vulnerable to trafficking. However, according to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2022, the government has continued its enforcement efforts and improved its performance on victim assistance.

Germany

Population: 83,300,000
Capital: Berlin
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Germany is a representative democracy with a vibrant political culture and civil society. Political rights and civil liberties are largely assured in law and practice. The political system is influenced by the country's totalitarian past, with constitutional safeguards designed to prevent authoritarian rule. Although Germany has generally been stable since the mid-20th century, political tensions have grown in recent years following a sharp increase in the number of asylum seekers in the country, and the growing popularity of right-wing populist movements.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Following the Russian military invasion of Ukraine in February, more than one million Ukrainian refugees and asylum seekers entered Germany.
- In December, German security services conducted raids in more than 150 locations across the country and arrested 25 people affiliated with the so-called Reichsbürger (Citizens of the Reich) movement, a far-right terrorist group accused of plotting to violently overthrow the government. Investigations into the movement remained ongoing at year's end.
- Investigations into the so-called Cum-Ex tax fraud scandal—a years-long scheme in which participants fraudulently obtained tax rebates, resulting in the theft of at least 10 billion euros ($10.7 billion) from the state—continued throughout the year. In August, Chancellor Olaf Scholz was questioned by members of Hamburg's state parliament over allegations that he was involved in the scandal while mayor of Hamburg in 2016–17; Scholz has denied any wrongdoing.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Germany's head of state is a largely ceremonial president, elected by the Federal Convention, a body formed jointly by the Bundestag (Federal Parliament) and state representatives. The president can serve up to two five-year terms. Former foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier was reelected for a second term in February 2022.

The federal chancellor—the head of government—is elected by the Bundestag and serves for the duration of a legislative term, unless the Bundestag votes to elect a replacement in a "constructive vote of no confidence." Incumbent chancellor Olaf Scholz was elected by the Bundestag following free and fair federal elections in 2021. Scholz, of the center-left Social Democratic Party (SPD), leads a coalition government composed of three parties: the SPD, the Green Party, and the liberal Free Democratic Party (FDP).

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The parliament includes a lower house (Bundestag), and an upper house, the 69-seat Federal Council (Bundesrat), which represents the country's 16 federal states. The Bundestag is elected at least every four years through a mixture of proportional representation and single-member districts. The 2021 elections were competitive and deemed free and fair by local and international election monitors.

In the 2021 elections, the SPD won 206 seats, gaining a narrow majority over the center-right Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and its Bavarian sister party, the Christian Social Union (CSU). The CDU–CSU won 196 seats—a nearly 9 percent decline from the 2017 elections, and the party's worst result since 1949. The Greens won a record 118 seats, and the FDP won 92; following the elections, both parties entered a coalition government with the SPD. The right-wing populist Alternative for Germany (AfD) took 83 seats, and the far-left party the Left, widely viewed as a successor to the East German communists, took 39. One representative from the Danish minority party South Schleswig Voters' Committee (SSW) also entered the Bundestag.

In Germany's federal system, state governments have authority over matters such as education, policing, taxation, and spending. State governments appoint Bundesrat members, and in this manner can influence national policies.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Germany's electoral laws and framework are fair and impartial. German voters cast two ballots—one for a candidate in their constituency and another for a party, with the latter vote determining the seat share a party receives in the Bundestag. If a party wins more seats in the first vote than are permitted by results of the second, it gets to keep these "overhang seats"—yet to avoid distorting the results of the second vote, all other parties receive "balance seats." With 736 lower-house members, Germany has the world's second-largest national parliament, after China.

To curtail the increasing size of the Bundestag, its members voted to adopt a two-step electoral reform in October 2020. The first step took effect ahead of the 2021 elections and includes a requirement that one party must gain more than three overhang seats for balance seats to be allocated to the other parties. The second step will reduce the number of constituencies, lowering the number of candidates able to win overhang seats in future elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

While the CDU–CSU and SPD have historically dominated German politics, other parties have increased their support in recent years. Parties do not face undue restrictions on registration or operation. Under electoral laws that, for historical reasons, are intended to restrict the far-left and far-right, a party must receive either 5 percent of the vote or win at least three constituency seats directly to gain representation in the parliament. The constitution makes it possible to ban political parties, although a party must be judged to pose a threat to democracy for a ban to be legal, and no party has been successfully banned since 1956.

Support for the AfD has risen in recent years as the party has moved further to the radical right. In 2022, the AfD held seats in the European Parliament, Bundestag, and all state parliaments with the exception of Schleswig-Holstein. While its popularity has shaken the German political system, most parties oppose the AfD and eschew coalitions that include it.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties in Germany have a realistic opportunity to increase their support and gain power through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The German government is democratically accountable to the voters, who are free to throw their support behind their preferred candidates and parties without undue influence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The constitution gives all citizens age 18 or older the right to vote, to stand for election, and to hold public office. However, some groups are politically underrepresented. Women hold only 34 percent of Bundestag seats. Some 11 percent of Bundestag members are from immigrant backgrounds, having at least one parent born without German citizenship.

Naturalization rates are low, leading to large numbers of long-term residents who cannot vote in federal elections. About 8.7 million foreign-born permanent residents were unable to vote in the 2021 federal elections, due in part to restrictive citizenship and voting laws.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Democratically elected representatives decide and implement policy without undue interference.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

While Germany generally maintains strong and effective corruption safeguards, the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) has criticized the country for its opaque party-financing regime and for a lack of lobbying regulations. To increase transparency, the former SPD and CDU–CSU coalition government introduced a lobby registry in 2021; the registry entered into effect in January 2022, requiring individuals representing interest groups to register before contacting officials in the federal government.

The June 2020 collapse of payment processing firm Wirecard brought scrutiny on the German financial regulatory system. Wirecard filed for bankruptcy after its accounting firm refused to sign off on financial statements over evidence of fraud. Wirecard chief executive Markus Braun was arrested on fraud and embezzlement charges in 2020; Braun's trial began in December, and was ongoing at year's end.

Investigations into the so-called Cum-Ex scandal—a share-lending scheme in which participants fraudulently obtained tax rebates, resulting in the theft of at least 10 billion euros ($10.7 billion) from the state between 2001 and 2016—continued in 2022. In December, Hanno Berger, a former tax official considered one of the leading figures in the scandal, was convicted on three counts of tax evasion and sentenced to eight years in prison by a state court in Bonn. Chancellor Scholz has also been accused of having ties to the scandal. In August, Scholz appeared before a parliamentary committee in Hamburg to answer questions about allegations that, while mayor of Hamburg in 2016–17, he colluded with the owners of a large bank in the city to help them avoid paying back approximately 47 million euros ($48 million) in refunded taxes. Scholz has denied any wrongdoing.

Germany is obligated to enhance legal protections for whistleblowers under an EU directive issued in 2019. The Bundestag passed the German Whistleblower Protection Act in December 2022; the bill remained awaiting consideration by the Bundesrat at year's end.

In August, the government announced a range of new initiatives intended to combat the relatively high levels of financial crime in Germany, including the creation of a new federal financial crime agency.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government is held accountable for its performance through open parliamentary debates. In 2018, the government introduced question time, in which the chancellor answers questions from the parliament three times per year. However, transparency is limited by an overburdened bureaucracy and inconsistent state-level standards.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of expression is enshrined in the constitution, and the media are largely free and independent. Hate speech, such as racist agitation or antisemitism, is punishable by law. It is illegal to advocate for Nazism, deny the Holocaust, or glorify the ideology of Hitler.

Journalists sometimes face harassment and abuse, especially via social media, as well as physical attacks when reporting on right-wing demonstrations. Such attacks were common in 2021 and 2022, especially against journalists reporting on far-right Querdenken (Lateral Thinking) demonstrations against COVID-19 restrictions.

While press freedom in Germany remains robust, it has faced obstacles in recent years, including decreasing media pluralism. The privacy of communications between journalists and their sources has been affected by surveillance provisions in the Federal Intelligence Service (BND) Act, ruled unconstitutional in 2020. Though a revised bill was passed by the Bundestag and Bundesrat in March 2021, Reporters Without Borders (RSF) says the bill still offers insufficient protections for journalists.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Freedom of belief is legally protected. However, eight states have passed laws prohibiting schoolteachers from wearing headscarves, while Berlin and the state of Hesse have adopted legislation banning headscarves for civil servants.

Antisemitism in Germany has been on the rise in recent years. The federal Ministry of the Interior recorded more than 3,000 criminal offenses against Jewish individuals and organizations in 2021, though the number of unreported cases was likely many times higher. Querdenken protesters regularly invoke antisemitic conspiracy theories.

Islamophobia also remains a concern. German police recorded at least 662 politically motivated attacks against Muslim individuals and institutions in 2021.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected, though legal prohibitions on extremist speech are enforceable in educational settings.

In late 2020, university employees—disadvantaged by a newly adopted 12-year time limit on fixed-term contracts—launched a grassroots initiative (#IchBinHanna) seeking a solution to precarious working conditions in academia. In 2021, the topic was taken up for discussion in the Bundestag, and in late 2022, the Bundestag's Committee on Education, Research, and Technology announced that reforms to the 2007 Science Time Contract Act, which regulates fixed-term employment in academia, were being drafted; the law had not been amended as of year's end.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion and internet access are generally unrestricted, but recent developments have prompted concern about government surveillance.

In June 2021, the government passed new legislation allowing the federal police and intelligence services to use spyware to surveil encrypted online messaging services like WhatsApp. Critics have called the legislation unconstitutional, and several German media rights organizations have filed lawsuits asking the courts to prevent the intelligence services from secretly surveilling the private communications of individuals who are not suspected of criminal activity. The Federal Constitutional Court (BVerfG) has repeatedly rejected such lawsuits. In April 2022, the BVerfG ruled that parts of a Bavarian law granting extensive surveillance powers to the domestic intelligence services in that state were unconstitutional in their scope. Though no changes had been enacted by year's end, the ruling will require the government to undertake reforms of similar laws nationwide.

Watchdogs continue to express concern about a controversial 2015 data-retention law that requires telecommunication companies to store users' telephone and internet data for 10 weeks. Critics view the law as a threat to general privacy and to whistleblowers, who could be punished under a section detailing illegal data handling. The law was later suspended and found to be incompatible with EU law by German courts; the European Court of Justice (ECJ) also found the law to be in violation of EU law in September 2022. Following the ECJ ruling, the government pledged to abolish the current data-retention law, though no action had been taken by year's end.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The right to peaceful assembly is enshrined in the constitution and is generally respected in practice, except in the case of outlawed groups, such as those advocating Nazism or opposing democratic order.

Several large protests took place in Germany during 2022, including widespread demonstrations against rising energy prices, growing inflation, and cost of living increases.

Additionally, large demonstrations against COVID-19 measures, which have been held regularly since 2020, continued in 2022. Some of these demonstrations have turned violent; since mid-2020, far-right Querdenken protesters have assaulted several journalists and repeatedly clashed with police and counterprotesters.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Germany has a vibrant sphere of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), which operate freely. In December 2020, the parliament passed a revised tax law that explicitly allowed more NGOs operating in areas including climate change and LGBT+ issues to claim tax-exempt status.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions, farmers' groups, and business confederations are generally free to organize, and play an important role in shaping Germany's economic model.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent, and generally enforces the rights provided by Germany's laws and constitution.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The rule of law prevails in Germany. Civil and criminal matters are treated according to legal provisions and with due process. However, under "preventive detention" practices, those convicted of certain violent crimes can be detained after serving their full sentence if they are deemed to pose a danger to the public.

In 2019, the ECJ ruled that German prosecutors were not allowed to issue European arrest warrants because of their dependence on state-level justice ministers. In 2021, the Federal Ministry of Justice and Consumer Protection (BMJV) proposed a draft law that would strengthen the independence of public prosecutors; as of late 2022, the law had not been passed.

The professionalism of law-enforcement officers has come into question following the 2018 discovery of a neo-Nazi network within the Frankfurt police. Since then, police in several cities and states have been accused of espousing extremist and discriminatory sentiments. An investigation into the issue was launched by the federal Ministry of the Interior in October 2020; a May 2022 report noted that investigators uncovered more than 325 cases of far-right extremist activity within Germany's security forces between July 2018 and July 2021.

Politically motivated crimes against public officials and politicians have increased in recent years. The political establishment was notably shaken by the 2019 murder of Hesse politician Walter Lübcke at the hands of a far-right extremist. In 2021, the Federal Criminal Police Office (BKA) registered 3,889 politically motivated violent crimes, compared to 3,365 in 2020.

Attacks on refugees and refugee housing continued to decline from a peak of 3,500 in 2016. According to the Ministry of the Interior, authorities recorded a total of 711 such crimes between January and September 2022, compared to 965 attacks during the same period in 2021.

In December 2022, German security services conducted raids in more than 150 locations across the country and arrested 25 people affiliated with the so-called Reichsbürger (Citizens of the Reich) movement, a far-right terrorist group accused of plotting to violently overthrow the government. Investigations into the movement remained ongoing at year's end.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees equality and prohibits discrimination based on origin, gender, religion or belief, disability, age, or sexual orientation. However, several obstacles stand in the way of equal treatment of all segments of the population. Race-based discrimination is commonplace, including continued discrimination against Roma and Sinti people.

Women's rights are protected under antidiscrimination laws. However, women face a gender-based pay gap—earning on average 18 percent less per hour than men as of 2021—while men are likelier to hold full-time employment. The differences were significantly higher in West Germany than in East Germany. A law requiring large German companies to reserve at least 30 percent of nonexecutive-board seats for women took effect in 2016, but this law affects a limited number of companies. A similar law went into effect in August 2021, requiring the executive boards of stock market–listed companies to include at least one woman; additionally, if the federal government holds majority ownership of a company, 30 percent of that company's board seats must be reserved for women.

More than one million Ukrainian refugees entered Germany following the Russian military invasion of Ukraine in February 2022. Refugees and asylum seekers are eligible to receive government services, though in practice such services, including housing and employment support, can be difficult to access. Societal discrimination against migrants, refugees, and asylum seekers is common.

New legal guidelines governing blood donation were enacted in 2021, lifting some of the regulations that had previously prevented gay and bisexual men from donating blood. However, LGBT+ activists say that the law still contains discriminatory restrictions. In June 2022, the government announced plans to introduce a new "self-determination law" that would ease regulations restricting the ability of individuals to change their legal name and gender; however, the reforms had not been passed by year's end.

In September 2022, a transgender man died after being violently assaulted during an LGBT+ event in Münster.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is legally protected and generally respected, although the refugee crisis and security concerns related to activity by the Islamic State (IS) militant group have led to some restrictions on travel. In 2015, the government introduced legislation allowing the confiscation of identity documents from German citizens suspected of terrorism to prevent them from traveling abroad, particularly to Iraq and Syria.

COVID-19-related restrictions on movement, including the imposition of lockdowns and curfews and restrictions on entry into Germany, were periodically introduced in several states throughout 2020 and 2021; nearly all such restrictions were lifted by June 2022.

The rights to own property and engage in commercial activity are respected.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

The government generally does not restrict social freedoms.

Adoption and tax legislation passed in 2014 gave equal rights to same-sex couples in these areas. The government legalized same-sex marriage in 2017.

In June 2022, the Bundestag voted to abolish a Nazi-era law banning doctors from providing information on abortion services.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

According to both the BKA and the US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons Report, migrants from Eastern Europe, Africa, and Asia are persistently targeted for sex trafficking and forced labor, and ethnic Roma are notably vulnerable to sex trafficking and to other forms of sex work. Germany has seen an increase in prosecutions and convictions of suspected traffickers in recent years.

Ghana

Population: 33,500,000
Capital: Accra
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Since 1992, Ghana has held competitive multiparty elections and undergone peaceful transfers of power between the two main political parties, the National Democratic Congress (NDC) and the New Patriotic Party (NPP). Although the country has a relatively strong record of upholding political rights and civil liberties, discrimination against women and LGBT+ people persists. There are some weaknesses in judicial independence and the rule of law, corruption and public service delivery present challenges to government performance, political violence as well as illegal mining causing destruction to water bodies is a growing concern.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Throughout the year, youth groups and trade unions continued to stage series of peaceful demonstrations to protest the rising cost of living and the government's poor economic management. The police responded to violence that occurred during the protests with fatal force: in May the police shot a 19-year-old student bystander to protests in the Bono East Region. In June, police used tear gas and water cannon to disperse crowds at a protest and arrested 29 participants.
- In October, a group of governing NPP lawmakers openly demanded that the minister of finance and the minister of state be dismissed in order to restore public faith in the economy after several months of poor economic performance. The opposition NDC brought forward a vote to remove the finance minister from office, which ultimately failed.
- Throughout the year, there was a surge off physical attacks and death threats made against journalists, and the government was increasingly intolerant of dissent from reporters. A radio show host commonly known as "Captain Smart" was arrested and detained by security forces for alleging that the president was involved in an illegal mining operation. In May, three individuals assaulted Eric Blessing Eshun and Emmanuel Egyirfah during their live radio broadcast, allegedly in retaliation for their coverage of the government's management of issues related to the country's fishing industry. Eshun was knocked unconscious during the attack, and the radio station was unable to broadcast for four days.

- The government continued to pursue its repression of LGBT+ rights advocates and people. In June, a billboard that promoted tolerance of the LGBT+ people was pulled down by Ghanian security after members of Parliament, who sponsored a 2021 bill that would further criminalize queer identities and the support of equal rights for LGBT+, demanded they do so.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who serves as head of state and head of government, is directly elected for up to two four-year terms. President Nana Akufo-Addo of the New Patriotic Party (NPP) won a second term in the December 2020 presidential election with 51.3 percent of the vote, while his predecessor, John Mahama of the National Democratic Congress (NDC), took 47.3 percent. African Union (AU) and European Union (EU) observers called the contest well-organized and generally peaceful, though EU monitors criticized a lack of campaign finance regulation and a misuse of state resources. Mahama rejected the results, alleging fraud, and issued a legal challenge. In March 2021, the Supreme Court dismissed Mahama's petition, stating that it lacked merit.

The immediate postelection period was marred by violence, with the national police reporting at least five deaths in the days following the vote. NDC supporters protested in parts of Ghana after the vote, notably marching on the Electoral Commission (EC) headquarters in Accra.

Members of the unicameral, 275-seat Parliament are elected directly in single-member constituencies to serve four-year terms.

The NPP, which held a majority in the previous parliament, and the NDC each won 137 seats in elections held concurrently with the 2020 presidential contest. One seat was won by an independent who agreed to support the NPP, giving that party a bare de facto majority. Monitors lauded the elections' overall conduct. Despite the NPP's majority, an NDC member was selected as speaker in January 2021.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Domestic and international observers consider the EC a capable manager of the electoral process. However, its composition has been the subject of political disagreement in the past; the NDC criticized what they claimed was the partisan appointment of Jean Mensa as its chairwoman in 2018, though civil society largely lauded the selection.

In general, electoral laws are enacted through broad consultations with parties and the legislature and are implemented fairly by the EC. While AU electoral observers lauded the registration process and the EC's overall performance during the 2020 elections, the EC agreed to enact reforms, including the introduction of continuous voter registration. In August 2022, the EC announced that voters will be required to present a National Identification Card (GhanaCard) to register to vote in the upcoming 2024 elections, in order to prevent ineligible people from being able to vote. The change drew criticism from the NDC for potentially discouraging eligible voters.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

The constitution guarantees the right to form political parties, and this right is generally respected. However, in November 2022, the EC cancelled the registration certificates of 17 political parties for noncompliance with the Political Parties Act of 2000—the parties did not have national or regional offices, as required by law. Despite the guaranteed formation of political groupings, civil society groups have expressed concern about the rising involvement of partisan vigilante groups in inter- and intraparty disputes. In addition, candidates from smaller parties have expressed frustration with how difficult it is to compete with bigger parties due to increasing registration and filing fees.

In 2020, Mensa announced that presidential candidates' filing fees would double. Further, an NPP lawmaker introduced a bill that would allow Ghanaians with dual citizenship to hold public offices.

There have been multiple peaceful transfers of power between the NPP and NDC, and parties in opposition have meaningful opportunities to increase their public support and win office. Mahama's defeat in the 2016 presidential race marked the first time since the 1992 reintroduction of multiparty politics that an incumbent stood for reelection and lost. Mahama's NDC maintains strong support as an opposition party.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Ghanaians are generally free from undue interference with their political choices by powerful groups that are not democratically accountable. However, voters and candidates are threatened by vigilantism and politically motivated violence, despite the 2019 promulgation of the Vigilantism and Related Offences Act, which banned all political and other vigilante groups.

NPP and NDC supporters clashed at several voter registration sites in 2020—despite an agreement between the two parties to refrain from such activity—resulting in one death. Of the 12 violent incidents recorded during the December 2020 elections, including those that resulted in five deaths, in only 2 cases had perpetrators been held accountable by the end of 2022.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Ghanaian laws provide for equal participation in political life by the country's various cultural, religious, and ethnic groups. Women formally enjoy political equality but hold comparatively few leadership positions in practice. Women won 40 parliamentary seats in the December 2020 elections, a slight increase over the 2016 results and the largest share since the reintroduction of multiparty politics.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are generally free to set and implement government policy without improper influence from unelected entities. However, the Imposition of Restrictions Act (IRA), which was passed by Parliament and signed by Akufo-Addo in 2020 as the COVID-19 pandemic became a global crisis, limited Parliament's ability to revoke presidentially declared states of emergency. In March 2022, the president lifted many of the COVID-19 pandemic measures, easing border restrictions, face-mask regulations, and limits to public gatherings; requirements for coronavirus testing were also reduced.

In October 2022, a group of governing NPP lawmakers openly demanded that the minister of finance and the minister of state be dismissed to restore public faith in the economy after several months of poor economic performance. The opposition NDC brought forward a vote to remove the finance minister from office, which ultimately failed.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Political corruption remains a problem despite active media coverage, fairly robust laws and institutions, and both government and nongovernmental antigraft initiatives. Legislation adopted in 2017 established the Office of the Special Prosecutor (OSP) as an additional institution to investigate political corruption.

Former attorney general Martin Amidu was appointed the first special prosecutor in 2018 but resigned in 2020, citing in part a lack of resources. In August 2021, Kissi Agyebeng, a lawyer and academic, was appointed as Amidu's successor, and nearly nine months later a governing board of the OSP was inaugurated. The OSP published information on the status of 75 cases (five of them high-profile) that it was investigating for potential corruption, including Eunice Jacqueline Buah Asomah-Hinneh, a member of the presidential advisory body, the Council of State. However, the office of the OSP has expressed doubts as to the integrity of the government's commitments to fighting corruption.

In October 2022, the Commission for Human Rights and Administrative Justice (CHRAJ) indicated that it was investigating 428 cases of public officials' failure to declare their assets as required by law between 2020 and 2022.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government operates with relative transparency, though there are weaknesses in the legal framework. The Right to Information Act, which grants citizens the right to seek, access, and receive information from public as well as some private institutions, came into effect in 2020. In 2022, several media actors and stakeholders complained about barriers and impediments to accessing information in practice, including arbitrary fees that public bodies charged groups that had requested information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 45 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of the press is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice. Ghana has a diverse and vibrant media landscape that includes state-owned and privately owned television and radio stations as well as a number of independent newspapers and magazines. Online news media operate without government restrictions. Government agencies occasionally limit press freedom by harassing and arresting journalists, especially those reporting on politically sensitive issues.

However, in 2022 there was a surge of physical attacks and death threats against journalists, and the government was increasingly intolerant of dissent from reporters. A radio journalist, Oheneba Boamah Bennie, was sentenced by an Accra High Court for contempt of court and sentenced to 14 days in prison and a fine of approximately $400; another radio host, Kwabena Bobie Ansah, was arrested for publishing allegedly false news and for offensive conduct toward the first and second ladies of Ghana; another journalist, Sacut Amenga-Etego, was arrested and detained for illegally filming the premises of a High Court. A radio show host commonly known as "Captain Smart" was arrested and detained by the NIB for alleging that President Akufo-Addo was involved in an illegal mining operation.

Violence against journalists included several reported cases of reporters being attacked by supporters of the NPP. In May 2022, three individuals assaulted Eric Blessing Eshun and Emmanuel Egyirfah during their live radio broadcast allegedly in retaliation for their coverage of the government's management of issues related to the country's fishing industry. Eshun was knocked unconscious during the attack, and the radio station was unable to broadcast for four days.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally and legally protected, and the government largely upholds these protections in practice. However, public schools feature mandatory religious education courses drawing on Christianity and Islam, and Muslim students have allegedly been required to participate in Christian prayer sessions and church services in some publicly funded Christian schools.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is legally guaranteed and generally upheld in practice.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is both free and vibrant. The government does not restrict individual expression on social media.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The right to peaceful assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected. Permits are not required for meetings or demonstrations. Assemblies were temporarily restricted under the COVID-19 state of emergency and related regulations, which were eased in 2022.

Ghanaians sought to organize protests over economic and social concerns under the #FixTheCountry banner during 2021 but were impeded by the authorities. In May 2021, the Accra High Court granted an injunction against a proposed #FixTheCountry rally, though the Supreme Court overturned that decision in June. Later in June, 11 organizers protesting in front of the Accra High Court were arrested. Supporters of the #FixTheCountry movement faced violence throughout the year; in late June unidentified assailants killed protester Ibrahim Muhammed in the town of Ejura. Demonstrations the day after his death saw police and military personnel use live ammunition when people clashed with security forces, killing 2 people and injuring at least four others.

Throughout 2022, youth groups and trade unions continued to stage series of peaceful demonstrations to protest the rising cost of living and the government's poor economic management. The police responded to violence that occurred during the protests with fatal force: in May the police shot a 19-year-old student bystander to protests in the Bono East Region. In June, police used tear gas and water cannon to disperse crowds at a protest and arrested 29 protesters.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally able to operate freely and play an important role in ensuring government accountability and transparency.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Under the constitution and 2003 labor laws, workers have the right to form and join trade unions. However, the government forbids or restricts organized labor action in several sectors, including fuel distribution and utilities, public transportation, and ports and harbor services.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judicial independence is constitutionally and legally enshrined. While the judiciary has demonstrated greater levels of impartiality in recent years, perception of corruption and bribery as well as delays in dispensing justice continue to pose challenges.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Constitutional protections for due process and defendants' rights are mostly upheld. However, police have been known to accept bribes, make arbitrary arrests, and hold people without charge for longer than the legally permitted limit of 48 hours. The government is not obliged to provide the accused with legal counsel, and many people unable to afford lawyers are forced to represent themselves in court. In July 2022, President Akufo-Addo signed a bill to formally introduce plea bargaining for most criminal offences.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Prisons are overcrowded and conditions can be life threatening, though the prison service has attempted to reduce congestion and improve the treatment of inmates in recent years. While death penalty remains in the statutes, it has rarely been applied and no one has been executed or sentenced to death since 1993.

Communal and ethnic violence is known to occur in parts of Ghana. A protracted chieftaincy dispute in Bawku's upper east region was reignited in September 2022, which resulted in the death of at least three people.

Despite equal rights under the law, women face societal discrimination, especially in rural areas, where their opportunities for education and employment are limited. However, women's enrollment in universities has been increasing in recent years. People with disabilities face societal discrimination.

LGBT+ people face significant discrimination. Same-sex sexual activity remains criminalized, encouraging impunity for violence against and harassment of LGBT+ people. The NGO LGBT+ Rights Ghana, which opened the country's first LGBT+ community center in January 2021, faced significant opposition from political and religious figures as well as violent threats. The center was raided by security officers in February 2021 and was closed by police later that month.

A bill that would limit the rights of LGBT+ people was also considered by Parliament in 2021. In early August, Parliament held its first reading of the Promotion of Proper Human Sexual Rights and Ghanaian Family Values Bill, which would criminalize displays of affection and cross-dressing; also as a result of the law, those engaging in certain forms of LGBT+ advocacy could face prison sentences as long as 10 years. In June 2022, a billboard that promoted tolerance of the LGBT+ people was pulled down by Ghanian security forces who were ordered to do so by members of Parliament that sponsored the 2021 bill. The speaker of Parliament stated at a media briefing in November 2022 that a bill criminalizing open expressions of queer identity, as well as for supporting equal rights for LGBT+ people, would pass before the next general elections in 2024.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement is guaranteed by the constitution and is generally respected by the government. However, poorly developed road networks and banditry can make travel outside the capital and tourist areas difficult. Police have been known to set up illegal checkpoints to demand bribes from travelers. Bribery is also rife in the education sector. Authorities instituted movement restrictions during the COVID-19 pandemic, which were eased in 2022.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Although the legal framework generally supports property ownership and private business activity, weaknesses in the rule of law, corruption, and an underregulated property rights system remain impediments. Bribery is a common practice when starting a business and registering property. More and more frequently in recent years, political elites and government officials have appropriated public land for themselves while in office. Reports from May 2022 found that a former general secretary of the ruling NPP and head of Ghana's Forestry Commission had appropriated forest reserve lands in his will to his family after his death.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

While personal social freedoms are upheld in many respects and among large segments of the population, domestic violence and rape are serious problems, and harmful traditional practices including female genital mutilation (FGM) and early or forced marriage persist in certain regions.

The government has worked to combat gender-based violence (GBV), including by expanding the police's domestic violence and victim support units and creating special GBV courts, though such services are reportedly under resourced.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Most workers are employed in the informal sector, limiting the effectiveness of legal and regulatory safeguards for working conditions. The exploitation of children in the agricultural and mining sectors remains a problem. Similar abuses in the fishing industry have also been reported, especially in the region surrounding Lake Volta.

In its Trafficking in Persons Report 2022, the US State Department noted that the Ghanaian government increased the number of trafficking victims that had been identified and referred between 2021 (727) and 2020 (391). However, law enforcement efforts remained under resourced.

Greece

Population: 10,600,000
Capital: Athens
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Greece's parliamentary democracy features vigorous competition between political parties. Ongoing concerns include corruption, discrimination against immigrants and religious and ethnic minority groups, and poor conditions for irregular migrants and asylum seekers.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In July, the Supreme Court's Judicial Council unanimously decided to refer Dimitris Papangelopoulos, the former minister of justice of the SYRIZA-ANEL coalition government, to a special court for abuse of power and breach of duty. The Special Court convened in September to try Papangelopoulos for the charges, which are related to two interventions he made in the judiciary.
- The media reported that National Intelligence Service (EYP) officials were surveilling the phones of politicians, journalists, and military and police officials. Among those targeted was an opposition leader. The chief of EYP and the secretary general to the prime minister resigned over the scandal.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40 (−2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The largely ceremonial president is elected by a parliamentary supermajority for a five-year term. The prime minister is chosen by the president and is usually the leader of the largest party in the parliament. Kyriakos Mitsotakis, head of the center-right party New Democracy (ND), took office as prime minister after the 2019 elections, replacing incumbent Alexis Tsipras of the Coalition of the Radical Left (SYRIZA). Katerina Sakellaropoulou, a longtime judicial official who had been nominated by ND but was also supported by SYRIZA and the center-left Movement for Change (PASOK–KINALI), was elected president in 2020.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 300 members of the unicameral Hellenic Parliament are elected to serve four-year terms through a mixture of 8 single-member constituencies, 48 multimember constituencies, and a national constituency with 12 seats. Under the electoral law in effect for the 2019 elections, the party with the most votes received a 50-seat bonus, making it easier to form a governing majority.

In the 2019 elections, ND won a single-party majority of 158 seats. SYRIZA lost its leading position, falling to 86 seats, while KINAL won 22. Among smaller parties, the Communist Party of Greece (KKE) took 15, the right-wing Greek Solution took 10, and the left-wing European Realistic Disobedience Front (MeRA25) secured 9. The far-right Golden Dawn party failed to win representation.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The country generally has fair electoral laws and equal campaigning opportunities. A compulsory-voting system is not strongly enforced. If passed with a two-thirds supermajority, changes to electoral law are implemented for the following elections. If passed with a simple majority, they go into effect after the following elections. An electoral law passed by the SYRIZA-led government with a simple majority in 2016 abolished the 50-seat bonus awarded to the winning party and was set to take effect after the 2019 elections. In January 2020, the ND government secured passage of legislation that would restore a bonus system, awarding between 20 and 50 bonus seats to the leading party depending on its share of the national vote. The new law also passed with a simple majority, meaning it would take effect only after the next elections.

In 2019, the ND government passed a law expanding the voting rights of diaspora and overseas Greek citizens. Citizens living abroad can participate in elections by proving residency in Greece for a two-year period within the last 35 years.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

The political system features vigorous competition among a variety of parties. Six parties were represented in Parliament as of 2021, and many others competed in the 2019 elections but did not pass the 3 percent threshold for representation.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Greece has established a strong pattern of democratic transfers of power between rival parties, with the Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK) and ND alternating in government for most of the past four decades. In 2012, the Democratic Left (DIMAR) split off from the Synaspismós party and joined a coalition government with PASOK and ND. In 2015, the radical left party SYRIZA, which saw its power increase during the financial crisis, won the parliamentary election. Together with the far-right party Independent Greeks (ANEL), a splinter party of ND, SYRIZA created a coalition that regained power and formed a government in September 2015.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

No group or institution from outside the political system exerts undue influence over the choices of voters and candidates.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Greece's largest recognized minority population, the Muslim community of Thrace, has full political rights, and three members of the community won seats in the 2019 parliamentary elections. The authorities have rejected some ethnic groups' attempts to secure official recognition or to register associations with names referring to their ethnic identity, affecting their ability to organize and advocate for their political interests, though such associations are generally able to operate without legal recognition. Since 2010, documented immigrants have been allowed to vote in municipal elections.

Though there are no significant legal or practical barriers to women's political participation, women only hold a little more than a fifth of the seats in parliament and sexist and patriarchal attitudes dissuade their active participation. In January 2020, Katerina Sakellaropoulou became the first woman to be elected as president of Greece.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12 (−2)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Greek elected officials generally set and implement government policies without undue interference, and the influence of international creditor institutions has receded over the past decade.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4 (−1)

Corruption remains a problem in Greece, and institutions tasked with combating it have inadequate resources. Tax officials in past years have been implicated in tax evasion schemes, which seriously complicate the government's fiscal reform efforts. A new criminal code and a new code of criminal procedure, adopted in 2019, allow prison time for the bribery of politicians and are more broadly aligned with relevant international conventions. However, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) expressed serious concerns that the main active bribery offense was converted from a felony to a misdemeanor.

In March 2021, a special committee was created to investigate accusations that former digital governance minister Nikos Pappas had received bribes and rigged a television licensing competition. That July, Parliament voted in favor of prosecuting Pappas through a special court in collaboration with the Judicial Council and the prosecutorial authority. After no clear evidence of bribery emerged in the pre-investigative committee, Pappas was only referred to the Supreme Court for breach of duty. In June 2022, the Supreme Court's Judicial Council referred Pappas to a special court for his handling of the television-license tender. The Special Court, which will examine the charges of dereliction of duty, is comprised of judges from the Supreme Court and the Council of State.

In mid-June 2022, former minister of justice of the SYRIZA-ANEL coalition government, Dimitris Papangelopoulos, was referred to the Supreme Court for a series of interventions he made in the judiciary while he was in office, but was only examined by the Supreme Court for two of them. In July 2022, the Supreme Court's Judicial Council unanimously decided to refer him to the Special Court for abuse of power and subsequent breach of duty. It is the fourth time since Greece's transition to democracy in 1974 that this Special Court has been activated. Papangelopoulos's trial started in September 2022.

The same special court also examined the former head of the corruption prosecutor's office, Eleni Touloupaki, for abuse of power related to her failure to send a report to Parliament for further investigation. The report was filed by PASOK members of parliament against the SYRIZA-ANEL government's health minister and his deputy, and pertained to the Novartis case, in which 10 politicians were accused of receiving donations from the pharmaceutical company Novartis.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because anticorruption laws have not been enforced and authorities have failed to fully prosecute several corrupt officials.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4 (−1)

Several laws and government programs are designed to ensure the transparency of official decisions and provide public access to information. Officials are required to make public declarations of their assets and income. Nonetheless, implementation of these transparency regulations is problematic.

The transparency of state procurement contracts remains a concern. Extraordinary conditions related to the COVID-19 pandemic paved the way for direct procurement of public works without a call for tenders. Despite these conditions no longer existing, procurement practices have not gone back to normal.

Gaps in transparency also exist with respect to public debtors. Though the state is obliged to publicize the names of debtors who owe the public sector over €150,000 ($163,000), the archive of tax and social security debtors has not been updated since 2019. In July 2022, its publication was postponed for another year.

Issues with surveillance also undermine transparency. In 2022, investigative news outlets reported that the National Intelligence Service (EYP) had wiretapped the mobile phones of journalists Stavros Malihoudis, Anastasios Telloglou, and Thanasis Koukakis, and that Koukakis's phone had also been infected by Predator spyware. In July, the National Transparency Authority (EAD)—created to tackle abuses of power—claimed it found no incriminating evidence against the government in its investigation. In August, EYP's director admitted to a closed session of the parliamentary Committee on Institutions and Transparency that the intelligence agency had carried out surveillance of Koukakis as a matter of national security.

Also in August, the Hellenic Authority for Communication Security and Privacy (ADAE) revealed that the mobile phone of Nikos Androulakis, leader of Greece's third largest political party and a member of the European Parliament, was wiretapped in 2021. While the government claimed that spying on Androulakis's phone was wrong but legal, the chief of EYP and the general secretary to the prime minister subsequently resigned. Despite pressure from opposition politicians and journalists to reveal the rationale for spying on Androulakis, the government did not offer a justification and argued that it was a matter of national security. In September, a parliamentary inquiry was opened, but only examined a small number of witnesses, despite the disagreement of opposition parties.

In November, a newspaper published the names of over 30 politicians, journalists, entrepreneurs, chief defense and police officials, along with their partners, who were targeted by surveillance.

Though the government introduced the Act of Legislative Content in August, it did not repeal a 2021 provision that prevents ADAE from retroactively informing targets about surveillance measures taken against them for reasons of National Security. In December 2022, parliament began considering a draft surveillance law that academics and human rights organizations argued lacks effective privacy and human rights safeguards.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because authorities obscured information about improper government surveillance against politicians and journalists, destroyed material evidence, and blocked witnesses from testifying in a parliamentary inquiry.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 50 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution includes provisions guaranteeing freedom of the press, and these are generally upheld in practice, though the law imposes some limits related to defamation, hate speech, and other such content. While citizens continue to enjoy access to a broad array of print, broadcast, and online news outlets, ownership concentration and editorial interference from owners remain concerns, and the government has been accused of directing public funds toward friendly private media.

Journalists have been subject to assaults or other mistreatment, particularly while attempting to cover issues related to corruption and immigration. In 2022, reporter Thanasis Koukakis's mobile phone was wiretapped and journalist Nektaria Stamouli's reporting on surveillance and wiretapping incidents led to attempts to discredit her by a government spokesperson. The general secretary to the prime minister, Grigoris Dimitriadis, filed defamation lawsuits against investigative media and journalists following his resignation in August, asking them to retract all publications associating him with the wiretapping scandal and seeking more than half a million euros in compensation from defendants.

Despite these incidents, the media environment remains highly free and plural, as demonstrated by robust investigative journalism that has shed light on surveillance and wiretapping incidents, including by Inside Story and Reporters United.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, and this is generally respected in practice. However, the Orthodox Church of Greece—which has a special constitutional status as the "prevailing religion" of the country—receives government subsidies, and its clergy's salaries and pensions are paid for by the state. The constitution prohibits proselytizing, but this restriction is rarely enforced. Members of some minority religions face discrimination and legal barriers, such as permit requirements to open houses of worship.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on academic freedom in Greece, and the educational system is free of political indoctrination. A law passed in February 2021 introduced police forces to some university campuses in an effort to fight crime, a longstanding problem in some institutions. Delays in the implementation of the policy echo the government's ambivalence in light of opposition, protest, and violence.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

The government does not engage in improper monitoring of personal expression. Individuals are generally free to discuss their views in practice.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12 (+1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4 (+1)

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed by the constitution, and the government generally protects this right. While the government passed a bill regulating public assemblies following the COVID-19 pandemic, protests continue to take place normally following the ease of pandemic-related restrictions.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because the COVID-19-related assembly restrictions were lifted, increasing the opportunities for public assemblies.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) generally operate without interference from the authorities. However, during 2020 the government made a series of changes to the registration requirements for organizations working on asylum and migration issues, generally increasing the regulatory burden on NGOs.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Most workers have the right to form and join unions, bargain collectively, and strike. The law provides protections against discrimination toward union members, and the government generally upholds union rights.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary is largely independent, though its autonomy is undermined somewhat by corruption. Judges are appointed by the president on the advice of the Supreme Judicial Council, which is mostly composed of other judges. They serve until retirement age and cannot be removed arbitrarily.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The law provides safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, ensures access to defense counsel, and provides for fair trial conditions. Persistent problems include court backlogs that lead to prolonged pretrial detention as well as improper detention of asylum seekers.

In September 2022, the Criminal Court of Appeal acquitted 20 defendants who were accused of money laundering during the signing of a contract with Siemens to digitize the Organization for Telecommunications (OTE). The Criminal Court of Appeal's verdict overturned a lower court decision from 2019, which had given multiyear sentences to all defendants. The majority of the defendants were being prosecuted for activities committed before 2002, and charges were dropped due to the expiration of the statute of limitations. The prosecutor of the Supreme Court ordered a preliminary investigation into individuals who participated in the procedural handling of the case.

While overall rates of violent crime are low, there are occasional acts of politically motivated violence and vandalism by left- or right-wing extremist groups. Some prisons and detention centers suffer from substandard conditions, and law enforcement personnel have been accused of physical abuse, particularly against vulnerable groups such as migrants and asylum seekers.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Women generally enjoy equality before the law, though they continue to face workplace discrimination in practice.

Violence targeting immigrants, refugees, and LGBT+ people remains a problem. Romani individuals are also subject to discrimination and excessive policing despite legal protections.

Greek authorities have been accused of forcibly returning migrants and asylum seekers who attempt to enter irregularly from Turkey by land and sea, and multiple cases of such pushbacks were documented in 2022. The European Anti-Fraud Office (OLAF) found that the European Border and Coast Guard Agency (FRONTEX) routinely covered up illegal pushbacks of migrants and asylum seekers by the Greek coastguard. The Greek government has denied these allegations.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is generally unrestricted for most residents. Most restrictions aimed at limiting the spread of COVID-19 were lifted in 2022. Some rules about wearing masks indoors, such as on public transport, remained in place at the end of the year, and any visitor who tested positive for COVID-19 while in the country faced a five-day mandatory quarantine.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The government and legal framework are generally supportive of property rights and entrepreneurship, but bureaucratic obstacles can inhibit business activity. Those who have political connections or are willing to pay bribes can sometimes expedite official procedures. To pressure tax-evading property owners who misrepresent the value of their assets, the Independent Authority for Public Revenue announced significant fines for this offense in 2019.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

There are no major constraints on personal social freedoms, though domestic violence remains an important problem. From the beginning of 2022 to September, 17 women were murdered by current or former male partners.

The government and civil society have taken initiatives to acknowledge and raise awareness of violence against women. The prime minister introduced the term femicide into public debate, and as of 2022, 44 counseling centers had assisted 44,200 women with problems at home. Also as of 2022, 12 domestic violence departments had been established in police stations, each with 15 police officers trained to deal with complaints of domestic violence, and more than 1,200 police officers took part in special seminars on femicides. In the first seven months of 2022, over 5,000 domestic violence cases were brought to court.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Most residents enjoy legal protections against exploitative working conditions, but labor laws are not always adequately enforced. Migrants and asylum seekers are especially vulnerable to trafficking for forced labor or sexual exploitation, and government efforts to combat the problem, while increasing, remain insufficient, according to the US State Department.

Grenada

Population: 100,000
Capital: St. George's
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Grenada is a parliamentary democracy that regularly holds credible elections. Ongoing concerns include corruption, discrimination against LGBT+ people, and violence against women and children.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In the June elections, the opposition National Democratic Congress (NDC) defeated the New National Party (NNP). Dickon Mitchell of the NDC succeeded Keith Mitchell of the NNP as prime minister.
- In late October, the NDC government accused its predecessor of accepting funds for the issuance of a diplomatic passport and diverting some of those funds to a party-linked constituency account just before the June elections. In November, a former minister in the NNP government admitted that it accepted funds for passports as a policy but denied wrongdoing on its part.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, usually the leader of the largest party in Parliament, is head of government. Following the June 2022 elections, NDC leader Dickon Mitchell was sworn in as prime minister.

The prime minister is appointed by the governor general, who represents the British monarch as head of state. Cécile La Grenade became Grenada's first woman governor general in 2013.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The bicameral Parliament consists of the directly elected, 15-seat House of Representatives, whose members serve five-year terms, and the 13-seat Senate, which is appointed by the governor general. Ten Senate seats are appointed on the advice of the prime minister and the remaining three on the advice of the opposition leader; senators also serve five-year terms.

The NDC won the June 2022 elections, winning 9 of lower house's 15 seats and defeating the NNP government. Organization of American States (OAS) observers expressed concern over a lack of campaign finance regulations and other issues but deemed the polls credible.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair, and they are usually implemented impartially by the supervisor of elections, who heads the Parliamentary Elections Office.

The unbalanced size of constituencies has resulted in unequal voting power among citizens. Grenada has not updated their boundaries since gaining independence in 1974.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties can organize freely. While a number of small parties have competed in elections, the first-past-the-post system encourages two-party politics, and since 1999 only the NNP and NDC have won seats in Parliament. Weak campaign finance laws potentially create an unfair advantage for certain parties.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

There are realistic opportunities for opposition parties to increase their support or gain power through elections, and power has rotated on several occasions since democracy was restored to Grenada in 1984. The NNP has won a majority of the elections since then, and the NDC failed to win any seats in the House of Representatives in the 2013 and 2018 elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People are generally able to express their political choices without encountering pressure from outside actors. However, the OAS has expressed concern about a lack of transparency and regulation of campaign finance procedures, which could create avenues for undue influence over candidates and voters by business or other special interest groups.

Grenada's constitution guarantees universal suffrage for adult citizens. Political representation largely reflects a population that is over 90 percent of African or mixed descent. However, other ethnic groups have a voice in politics and are represented in Parliament.

Women remain underrepresented in politics, with women winning only 5 of the lower house's 15 seats in the June 2022 polls. OAS observers reporting on those polls noted that "a high level of violence against women, fear of victimization, societal backlash for entering politics, and unpaid care-work" inhibit female participation. Women's advocacy groups do exert political influence, however.

The marginalization of LGBT+ people impacts their ability to engage fully in political and electoral processes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The appointed prime minister and cabinet and freely elected representatives are able to determine the policies of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption remains a prominent issue in Grenada, despite safeguards enshrined in the Prevention of Corruption Act and the Integrity in Public Life Act. Several suggested amendments in a 2016 constitutional reform package would have strengthened anticorruption safeguards, but all were voted down by significant margins.

Grenada's Citizenship by Investment program, which allows foreigners to gain citizenship through an economic investment in the country, continues to trouble some analysts due to the potential for fraud and abuse, despite the tightening of rules governing it.

Since taking power, the NDC government accused the former NNP government of corruption. In September 2022, Tevin Andrew, the minister for Carriacou and Petite Martinique affairs, said that his ministry had been seriously affected by corruption. In late October, Prime Minister Dickon Mitchell alleged that the former NNP government accepted funds in return for a diplomatic passport and diverted some of that money into an NNP-linked constituency account days before the June polls. In November, former foreign minister Oliver Joseph disclosed that the NNP government accepted funds for diplomatic passports as a policy, but denied wrongdoing on the former government's part.

Other government bodies and civil society groups faced scrutiny over their conduct in 2022. In September, the Integrity Commission reported significant failings at the state-owned Marketing and National Importing Board (MNIB) and called for a forensic audit. The Integrity Commission had launched its investigation after a former MNIB chief executive was accused of misusing funds. Also in September, the NDC government launched an investigation into the FAITH Organization for People's Development, a nongovernmental organization (NGO) with ties to the NNP, after documents revealed that the NGO had received considerably more government funding than other groups.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government of Grenada generally operates with transparency. All public officials are required to declare their assets. An appointed commission monitors and verifies declarations but does not disclose them publicly except in court. Grenadian laws permit authorities to request financial information about its citizens residing abroad in an effort to prevent tax avoidance. The Fiscal Responsibility Oversight Committee has noted that the opacity of data involving state-run entities and other financial liabilities has impeded it from fulfilling its role.

There is no law to ensure public access to information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 52 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

In 2012, Grenada became the first Caribbean country to decriminalize defamation, but seditious libel remains a criminal offense. Politicians have initiated lawsuits against the media, contributing to self-censorship among journalists.

Press freedom advocates have criticized censorship at the country's largest broadcaster, the Grenada Broadcasting Network, which is partly owned by the government.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally protected and generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The government generally respects academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed, and that right is generally respected. Multiple COVID-19-related states of emergency limited social gatherings in 2020 and 2021, though coronavirus-related restrictions were largely lifted by the end of 2021. The state of emergency was lifted in April 2022.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

NGOs are generally free to operate.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The right of workers to form and join labor unions is constitutionally protected, though unions and labor activists face some obstacles. Workers have the right to strike, organize, and bargain collectively, though employers are not legally bound to recognize a union if a majority of workers do not join.

Essential services workers may strike, but compulsory arbitration can be used to resolve disputes. The list of essential services is extensive and includes services that should not be considered as such according to International Labour Organization (ILO) standards.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

An independent judiciary is constitutionally guaranteed and courts commonly demonstrate their independence. There has not been tangible evidence of political interference in the judiciary in recent years. However, there are concerns that the judiciary is not properly resourced, thus impacting its efficacy.

Grenada is a member of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States court system and is a charter member of the Caribbean Court of Justice, but the judiciary relies on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London as its final court of appeal.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Detainees and defendants are guaranteed a range of legal rights, including the presumption of innocence and the right to trial without delay, which are mostly respected in practice. However, case backlogs have rendered trial delays common in practice. Additionally, staffing shortages prevent the state from providing legal counsel to some indigent defendants.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Grenada is free from war and insurgencies. Flogging remains a punishment for petty crimes. Prison conditions are poor. As of October 2022, the prison occupancy rate was 191.4 percent of official capacity, very high by regional standards. While Grenada is considered one of the safer Caribbean islands, there has been a rise in reports of sexual assault in recent years.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Same-sex sexual activity between men is a criminal offense, although the law is rarely enforced. In 2020, the director of public prosecutions declined to pursue charges against two men who were engaged in sex in a video that was circulated online, labeling the provision of the criminal code "obsolete." Nonetheless, LGBT+ people face significant societal discrimination, including threats of violence and public hostility.

The law does not prohibit discrimination in employment or occupation regarding sexual orientation, HIV-positive status, or gender identity.

In a letter published by the New Today news outlet in April 2022, a female Royal Grenada Police Force officer claimed that sexual harassment and abuse was pervasive within the force, and that high-ranking officers had engaged in such behavior.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is constitutionally guaranteed, and this right is generally respected in practice. The right to change employment is also generally respected.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The government of Grenada has encouraged both national and foreign investors to operate businesses in the country, but procedures involved in establishing a new business are onerous.

In 2021, the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes agreed to hear a case brought by a development firm against the Grenadian government. The company, which planned to build a resort, claimed that the government's arbitrary and unlawful conduct amounted to "indirect expropriation," and had stopped the successful completion of the project. The proceedings were ongoing as of the end of 2022.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Violence against women and children is a widespread issue in Grenada. According to a 2018 survey released in 2020, 29 percent of Grenadian women reported experiencing physical or sexual violence in their lifetime. Domestic violence legislation came into effect in 2011, but enforcement has been limited.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Poverty and unemployment are pervasive and hamper the social mobility of many Grenadians. In 2018, Grenada ratified the ILO's Domestic Workers Convention, to improve work conditions of domestic workers, who are mainly women. It came into effect in 2019. Children are not explicitly prohibited from doing hazardous work.

A 2015 law punishes human trafficking with up to 25 years' imprisonment and large fines. However, reports of human trafficking are rare.

Guatemala

Population: 17,800,000
Capital: Guatemala City
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: While Guatemala holds regular elections that are generally free, organized crime and corruption severely impact the functioning of government. Violence and criminal extortion schemes are serious problems, and victims have little recourse to justice. Journalists, activists, and public officials who confront crime, corruption, and other sensitive issues risk attack.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- During the year, Attorney General María Consuelo Porras—who was reappointed for another four-year term in May—continued to use her mandate to block high-profile corruption investigations and weaponize the justice system against independent anticorruption prosecutors. Judges and prosecutors working on corruption cases were removed, transferred, or prevented from taking their posts, and many faced threats, spurious criminal prosecutions, and were forced to leave the country.
- Judges and prosecutors engaged in efforts to bring past human rights abusers to justice also faced intimidation, harassment, and attacks during the year. In November, the judge in a high-profile case related to forced disappearances between 1983–85 was forced to resign and leave the country to avoid imprisonment on frivolous charges.
- The year saw a worsening climate of intimidation and attacks against civil society and members of the media, forcing several journalists and prominent human rights defenders to leave the country. Others were jailed on spurious charges, including prominent independent journalist José Rubén Zamora, who was arrested in July for alleged financial crimes; he remained in detention at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 20 / 40 (−1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The constitution stipulates a four-year presidential term and prohibits reelection. In the August 2019 runoff, Alejandro Giammattei of the Vamos party won 58 percent of the vote, defeating former first lady Sandra Torres of the center-left National Unity for Hope party (UNE). While the results were judged as credible, Organization of American States (OAS) electoral observers noted irregularities including disturbances, ballot burning, voter intimidation, and acts of violence. Giammattei took office in January 2020.

The preelection period was marked by successful efforts to disqualify presidential candidates. In one instance, presidential candidate and former attorney general Thelma Aldana, who pursued a high-profile corruption case against former president Otto Peréz Molina, was barred and fled the country after receiving threats, allegedly issued by the targets of her investigations. In February 2022, international media outlets reported that Giammattei had received illicit funds for his presidential campaign; the president denied the accusations.

Members of the unicameral, 160-seat Congress are elected to four-year terms. Legislators were elected in June 2019, concurrently with the first round of the presidential election and mayoral races. The UNE won 53 seats while Giammattei's Vamos party won 16 seats. The Union of National Change (UCN) won 12, and the remaining 79 seats were split between 16 parties, none of which won more than 10 seats.

The 2019 election results were deemed credible, but observers noted irregularities, disturbances, and threats of violence. A number of local races were nullified or rescheduled by electoral authorities due to death threats against electoral officials and violent incidents. Election monitors received reports of discrimination against women officeholders and candidates.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

In March 2020, after months of delay, Congress elected new Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE) magistrates in a session featuring little transparency. Several of those elected are reportedly associated with officials accused of corruption and drug trafficking, and have been accused of falsifying their academic credentials.

Though campaigning ahead of the scheduled 2023 general elections is prohibited until January of that year, electoral authorities did not restrict campaign activities by the ruling party and other conservative parties in 2022. However, the TSE sanctioned the leader of the left-wing People's Liberation Movement party (MLP) in August for "expressing an opinion" on national issues by retweeting the words "plurinational state."

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

Political groups and organizations generally operate without encountering legal restrictions. However, new groups sometimes face bureaucratic delays from the TSE when attempting to register.

Elections take place within an inchoate multiparty system in which new parties are frequently created, often without sufficient resources and infrastructure to gain broad support. Poor enforcement of party finance regulations has allowed some candidates and parties access to vast resources.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4

Elections at the national and local levels are competitive, and new parties routinely gain significant quotas of power. Guatemalan politics are unstable, and power rotates between parties frequently, which can discourage a traditional opposition from coalescing. At least 10 candidates were killed during the 2019 election period.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Verbal harassment and physical violence against voters are common during elections and can deter political participation. Weak enforcement of campaign finance regulations has permitted lopsided resource advantages, as well as financing of candidates by special interests and organized criminal groups, distorting the political choices of citizens. Direct vote buying and use of public funds to influence the outcome of elections is also common. Observers reported that armed groups and criminal organizations have attempted to sway the results of local races.

Members of ethnic and other minority groups struggle to fully exercise their political rights. There are no affirmative measures in place to promote the election of representatives of Indigenous peoples, who are underrepresented despite accounting for as much as 60 percent of the population. There are 16 Indigenous members of Congress, 4 of whom are women; approximately 25 percent of mayors elected in 2019 were Indigenous. No Indigenous persons or Afro-Guatemalans currently hold cabinet-level positions.

Women are underrepresented in politics, though small women's rights groups have some visibility in the political sphere. Giammattei appointed three women ministers to his cabinet but two left their posts. Women hold only 31 seats in Congress, and only 11 mayorships out of 340.

The first openly gay man to enter Congress was elected in 2019; since then, he has been the target of attacks and homophobic messages, including from the president and fellow legislators. Political opportunities remain rare for LGBT+ people.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12 (−1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The elected government and legislature determine government policies, but they are frequently subject to influence by outside interests. President Giammattei came to the presidency backed by a group of former military officials; such networks possess significant economic power and frequently oppose the peace process that Guatemala has been fitfully implementing since 1996.

Business groups continue to hold significant sway over all branches of government, and serve on the governing bodies of various public institutions. Organized crime groups have penetrated state institutions.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4 (−1)

Corruption, which is often related to organized crime, remains a serious problem. Since the 2019 closure of the International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG), authorities and lawmakers have obstructed the fight against corruption; prosecutions have stalled; and many high-profile cases have lost momentum or are being taken apart. Judges, prosecutors, and civil society actors committed to tackling corruption have increasingly been the targets of physical attacks, threats, malicious lawsuits, and defamation campaigns. As of October 2022, at least 25 judges and prosecutors have been forced into exile.

Since assuming office in 2018, Attorney General María Consuelo Porras has fired, transferred, or initiated frivolous cases against numerous anticorruption prosecutors and independent judges. In 2021, Porras conducted the unlawful and arbitrary removal of the head of the Special Prosecutor's Office against Impunity (FECI). In June and July 2022 alone, Porras removed 8 prosecutors and 11 administrative officials.

Recent investigations of electoral and party finance corruption have shed light on the influence of unelected and illicit groups over the government. Serious allegations link drug trafficking to political elites.

In 2021 and 2022, the US government sanctioned several former and current Guatemalan government officials, including Attorney General Porras and at least 10 judges and prosecutors, for corruption-related offenses.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the Giammattei administration has effectively dismantled anticorruption safeguards by aggressively prosecuting judges and anticorruption officials on frivolous charges.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Public information offices frequently fail to publish data about public expenditures as required. The Law on Access to Information is poorly enforced; nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) continue to file grievances over this lack of enforcement and, together with the Human Rights Ombudsperson's Office (PDH), work to encourage the government to adhere to the law's provisions.

Contracting and budgeting processes are opaque and racked with corruption, which worsened during the COVID-19 pandemic due to the easing of procurement requirements.

In May 2022, the police suspended the publication of official data documenting homicides in the country, claiming that the information was confidential.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 29 / 60 (−1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16 (−1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4 (−1)

While the constitution protects freedom of speech, journalists self-censor when covering sensitive topics including drug trafficking, corruption, organized crime, and human rights violations. Public officials, illicit actors, the police, and individuals aligned with companies operating on Indigenous lands routinely threaten media workers.

Attacks, threats and spurious legal cases against journalists increased during 2022. According to the Guatemalan Association of Journalists, as of August 2022, there had been 350 attacks on the press during the Giammattei administration. In March, criminal proceedings were filed against journalist Juan Luis Font alleging unlawful association with former anticorruption judge Erika Aifán. Font left the country for fear of harassment. In July 2022, leading independent journalist José Rubén Zamora, the founder and president of prominent newspaper elPeriódico, was arrested on financial crimes charges, and authorities raided his home and elPeriódico's offices. In December, a judge ruled that Zamora must stand trial; he remained in detention at year's end. Financial problems forced the paper to cease its print publication at the beginning of December. Zamora's arrest has been widely condemned as an attempt by the government to stifle political dissent.

The government made no progress in implementing the 2012 protection program for journalists. The Special Prosecutor's Office for Crimes against Journalists is under-resourced and has been the target of surveillance.

Rural, Indigenous, and women journalists are afforded little protection from discrimination, threats, and frivolous legal action, and reporters covering regional news suffered attacks and detentions on several occasions in 2022. Women journalists have been the target of sexual harassment on social media.

Media ownership is highly concentrated, and independent media outlets face financial constraints due to decreasing advertisement revenue. The government has failed to act on a December 2021 ruling by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR) mandating that Indigenous communities be provided equitable access to radio frequencies. The country's cybercrime laws have failed to protect outlets and reporters from harassment by trolls for hire, while public officials abuse unrelated laws to censor media outlets.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the government has intensified its crackdown on journalists and media organizations, including by arresting the founder and president of one of the country's most prominent newspapers, elPeriódico.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees religious freedom, and individuals are free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Although the government does not interfere with academic freedom, scholars have received death threats for questioning past human rights abuses or continuing injustices.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Many Guatemalans take precautions when speaking about social and political issues outside of their homes due to a high level of insecurity in the country. Journalists and human rights defenders have reported incidents of harassment and surveillance, which, along with increased intimidation and harassment of perceived opponents of the government, has encouraged greater self-censorship among ordinary citizens.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but this right is not always protected. Police frequently threaten and at times use violence against protesters. Protests related to environmental or Indigenous rights have been met with harsh resistance from the police and armed groups.

The Giammattei administration has declared states of prevention and siege, emergency measures that enable the government to restrict constitutional guarantees, in response to protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of association, and a variety of NGOs operate. However, groups associated with Indigenous, environmental, and human rights face increasing violence and criminalization of their work. Several defenders have been forced to leave the country for fear of persecution, while lawyers defending human rights activists have been attacked and threatened. Between January and July 2022, 589 attacks against human rights defenders were registered by the Unit for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders in Guatemala (UDEFEGUA), a local NGO, marking an increase from previous years. Three activists were murdered during the year.

In November 2022, UDEFEGUA stated that the government has failed to fulfill the obligations of a 2014 ruling by the IACHR requiring the development of a comprehensive public policy to protect human rights defenders.

In July 2021, controversial and restrictive legislation targeting NGOs went into effect, giving such organizations until February 2022 to register or face dissolution. Implementation of the law has been slow, and according to the agency overseeing the process, only around 11 percent of NGOs complied with the deadline.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Guatemala is home to a vigorous labor movement, but workers are frequently denied the right to organize and face mass firings and blacklisting. Trade union members are also subject to intimidation, violence, and murder, particularly in rural areas. Labor laws obstruct union membership and impede strikes.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is hobbled by corruption, inefficiency, incapacity, and the intimidation of judges, prosecutors, and witnesses by outside actors and influential judicial figures. Those overseeing high-profile corruption and human rights cases have been removed, transferred or prevented from taking their posts; some have been subjected to threats, faced criminal prosecution, or forced to leave the country. In February 2022, the Supreme Court stripped prominent anticorruption judge Pablo Xitumul of his judicial immunity. Xitumul was subsequently suspended from his post.

In May, María Consuelo Porras was reappointed to another four-year term as attorney general in a controversial process. Porras has repeatedly blocked high-profile corruption investigations and weaponized the justice system against prosecutors, lawyers, and judges involved in the fight against corruption. In February, former FECI anticorruption prosecutor Virginia Laparra was arrested on specious charges of "continuous abuse of authority" and placed in preventive detention; Laparra was convicted of the charges in December and given a four-year prison sentence.

Corruption has also affected the process to select new Supreme Court and appellate court judges, which has remained stalled since 2019.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are guaranteed in the constitution, but those rights are inconsistently upheld, due in part to corruption in the judiciary and an ineffective police force in which many officers routinely violate the law and the rights of citizens. Access to justice remains difficult, especially for Indigenous people. Conviction rates are low.

Judges and prosecutors have reported an increase in threats and harassment, smear campaigns, and malicious criminal and disciplinary complaints in apparent retaliation for their work on sensitive cases related to corruption and human rights abuses.

High levels of violence, kidnappings, and extortion at the hands of the police, drug traffickers, and street gangs continue, with related fears and violence routinely affecting the lives of ordinary people. Links between the state, politicians, the military, and illicit actors complicate a cohesive response to the country's security challenges. In 2022, the country's homicide rate increased for the second year in a row. The police recorded 3,043 homicides during the year, compared to 2,843 in 2021, marking a 7 percent increase. Prison facilities are grossly overcrowded and rife with gang- and drug-related violence and corruption. Prison riots are common and are frequently deadly.

Efforts to bring perpetrators of past human rights abuses to justice have been significantly hampered by intimidation campaigns against those involved in the process. In January 2022, five former paramilitary members were convicted of sexual violence offenses committed during the war, and in February, a former military commissioner was found guilty of the 1983 forced disappearances of three social leaders and sentenced to 45 years in prison. In May, nine retired military and police officers were sent to trial in connection to the Death Squad Dossier, a record of forced disappearances between 1983–85. However, the judge and others working on the case have been subjected to numerous threats and attacks; the judge resigned and left Guatemala in November.

Equal rights are guaranteed in the constitution, but minorities continue to face unequal treatment. Indigenous communities suffer from high rates of poverty, illiteracy, and infant mortality. Indigenous women are particularly marginalized. Discrimination against the Mayan community is a major concern.

LGBT+ people face discrimination, violence, and police abuse and are unprotected by legislation. The PDH has stated that people living with HIV/AIDS also face discrimination.

The constitution prohibits discrimination based on gender, but women continue to face gender-based inequality; women are usually paid less for their labor than men, and sexual harassment in the workplace is not penalized.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

While there are no permanent restrictions on free movement, violence and the threat of violence by gangs and organized criminal groups inhibits this right in practice and has prompted the displacement of thousands of people. Movement is regularly restricted due to government-imposed states of siege and prevention. In 2022, a state of siege was imposed in two Indigenous communities due to violent land disputes.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Protections for property rights and economic freedom rarely extend beyond those with wealth and political connections. Land protections are especially limited for Indigenous people, particularly Indigenous women, despite a series of Constitutional Court rulings in 2020 that reinforced communal landholding rights in Indigenous communities. The 2020 closing of the Secretariat for Agrarian Affairs has stalled dialogues to resolve land conflicts and led to more evictions of Indigenous communities. At least four violent evictions of Indigenous communities took place during 2022.

In January, the Ministry of Energy and Mines granted the El Estor mine permission to resume operations after consultations with the community; however, those who engaged in the 2021 protests over the mine were excluded.

Business activity is hampered by criminal activity, including extortion and fraud. An inefficient state bureaucracy, rife with unclear and complicated regulations, also contributes to difficulties in establishing and operating a business.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Physical and sexual violence against women and children remains high, with perpetrators rarely facing prosecution. Femicides nearly doubled during the first five months of 2022 compared to the same period in 2021. According to the attorney general's office, 469 women were victims of femicide in 2022.

The law permits abortion only when a pregnancy threatens the life of the woman. However, legal abortion care is difficult to access in practice. In March, Congress passed a bill that would have increased restrictions on legal abortion and imposed up to 10 years' imprisonment for women who illegally obtained abortions. Days later, partly in response to widespread backlash, Giammattei said he would veto the bill, and Congress shelved it.

Teen pregnancy rates remain high; in 2017, underage marriages were outlawed, though the law is not effectively enforced.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Indigenous peoples' access to economic opportunities and socioeconomic mobility remains limited, with more than 70 percent of the population living in poverty. Income distribution across the entirety of the Guatemalan population is among the most unequal worldwide, with the wealthiest 10 percent of the population receiving nearly 50 percent of the total income nationally. Significant barriers to accessing education persist, particularly for girls, Indigenous children, and rural residents. Hurricanes Eta and Iota, which struck in 2020, caused widespread damage largely in majority-Indigenous areas and further deepened these challenges.

Child labor persists, especially among Indigenous children. Sexual exploitation particularly affects vulnerable groups including children, LGBT+ people, and Indigenous people. Gangs often force children and young men to join their organizations or perform work for them.

Guinea

Population: 13,900,000
Capital: Conakry
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Guinea experienced a transition to civilian rule in 2010, following a 2008 military coup and decades of authoritarian governance. Ethnic division, corruption, a crackdown on dissent, and the abuse of civilians by security forces marked the subsequent decade. A section of the armed forces, the Special Forces (GFS), staged another coup in September 2021, and coup leaders have since delayed a return to civilian rule, incarcerated critics, and brutally repressed protesters.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In January, transition president Mamady Doumbouya named the 81-member National Transitional Council (CNT). The interim legislative body's responsibilities include drafting a new constitution and facilitating a transition to constitutional rule. However, no new electoral framework has been established, and elections have not been scheduled.

- In May, the junta-led government effectively banned public demonstrations. Nevertheless, the National Front for the Defense of the Constitution (FNDC) continued organizing mass demonstrations calling for the immediate return of civilian rule, even after violent crackdowns by security forces against demonstrators.
- In August, the government formally dissolved the FNDC. Several FNDC leaders and functionaries were arrested and at year's end were awaiting trial.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 7 / 40 (−3)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12 (−1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

In September 2021, military commanders led by Lieutenant Colonel Mamady Doumbouya overthrew the government. Doumbouya was sworn in as interim president in October 2021, serving a term with no specified end date. The junta introduced a transitional charter that established the National Committee of Reconciliation and Development (CNRD), headed by Doumbouya, as a transitional governing body. CNRD members are prohibited from contesting future elections, but the junta has not specified which individuals are in the CNRD.

In August 2022, Doumbouya appointed Bernard Goumou as prime minister because his predecessor, Mohamed Béavogui, was absent due to ill health.

Under the 2020 constitution, the president is elected by popular vote for up to two six-year terms. That constitution included language that was interpreted as a reset of the term count for then president Alpha Condé, who had already served two five-year terms under the previous constitution. Condé won a highly controversial third term in October 2020.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The junta's transitional charter specifies the establishment of the 81-member National Transitional Council (CNT), which is responsible for drafting a new constitution. Members of the Condé administration were barred from participating in the CNT. President Doumbouya appointed CNT members from political parties, the security forces, the trade union movement, the business sector, and civil society. The CNT is led by Dansa Kourouma, a relative of Doumbouya, a long-term civil society functionary, and former supporter of President Condé.

The major opposition parties have no representation in the CNT, as they boycotted the 2020 legislative elections. Numerous civil society organizations and political parties have refused to participate in the CNT.

Guinea's previous electoral framework and administrative bodies facilitated credible elections, though there were sometimes disputes over the composition of the electoral bodies and electoral outcomes.

The 2020 constitution, which was approved in a referendum held concurrently with that year's parliamentary elections, instituted six-year terms for the president, up from five years under the previous charter. The junta that seized power in September 2021 suspended the constitution and the Independent National Electoral Commission. The transitional charter does not specify when new elections will be held.

In the wake of the coup, Guinea's ambassador to the United Nations stated that the junta would revise the voter roll ahead of elections. A decree from the interim president transferred responsibility for managing elections and referendums to the Ministry of Territorial Administration and Decentralization. In October 2022, the government agreed to limit the transition period to two years beginning in January 2023. The CNT has yet to start deliberating on a new electoral framework or to decide whether to maintain the previous framework.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because no new electoral framework has been created since the junta took power last year, and elections have not been scheduled.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16 (−2)

More than 150 political parties were officially recognized as of December 2021, with most having clear ethnic or regional bases of support. Article 6 of the transitional charter establishes the right for political parties to freely form. In practice, the operations of political parties are increasingly restricted under the junta, which in 2022 dismantled the country's largest opposition group.

In May 2022, the junta banned all political demonstrations "as long as public order cannot be guaranteed." This announcement effectively targeted the activities of the National Front for the Defense of the Constitution (FNDC), a coalition of civil society groups, political parties, and labor unions, which accuse the junta of authoritarian practices. In July, the government initiated legal proceedings against three FNDC leaders, who subsequently were arrested. In August the government formally dissolved the FNDC. The FNDC and other organizations such as the National Alliance for Alteration and Democracy (ANAD) and the formerly ruling Rally for the Guinean People (RPG) no longer participate in the dialogue with the junta.

In October, security forces used live ammunition against protesters calling for the return of civilian rule, and detained numerous FNDC sympathizers.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the junta formally dissolved the country's main opposition movement and cracked down on political demonstrations.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4 (−1)

The interim government rules through violence and intimidation. Because the political reconstruction process is controlled by President Doumbouya and his junta, the opposition appears to stand only a very limited chance to increase support or gain through elections. The date of the next elections has yet to be determined.

In 2022, security forces frequently attacked rallies and protests organized by the opposition, making it more difficult for opposition parties to mobilize their supporters. The government formally dissolved the main opposition movement in August.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the junta dissolved the country's main opposition movement and has overseen significant impediments to other groups' ability to contest future elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Previously, Condé's administration had reduced the influence of the military in politics, but the Special Forces (GFS), claimed power in 2021 and Doumbouya, the officer who led the GFS and the coup, became the interim president.

Ethnic loyalty played an outsized role in the political choices of voters and party leaders under Condé. Rather than organizing around policy platforms or political ideologies and trying to attract new supporters, each party tacitly pledged allegiance to its respective ethnic group, contributing to the threat of mutual hostility and violence.

There is widespread speculation that foreign-owned mining interests in Guinea, including Russian and Turkish operations, backed Condé and now back Doumbouya because they view him as best positioned to protect their interests.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women and members of ethnic and religious minority groups have full political rights under the law, but ethnic divisions and gender bias limit their participation in practice. Under a law passed in 2019, women must constitute 50 percent of electoral lists. Female representation in the National Assembly stood at only 16.7 percent prior to the 2021 coup.

The transitional charter included a 30 percent gender quota for the CNT, which is implemented in practice. Members of the LGBT+ community are poorly represented in political life.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

An unelected junta-led government has ruled the country since the military coup of September 2021.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

The country's underfunded and understaffed National Anti-Corruption Agency was further undermined by instability that accompanied the coup.

Junta leader and transition president Doumbouya announced the creation of a special anticorruption court (CRIEF) in December 2021. At the close of 2022, it was still difficult to judge the court's effectiveness or ascertain the true motives behind its formation. It has summoned the former prime minister and several former ministers of the Condé era, and placed them under arrest for embezzlement, but has refused to examine corrupt activities within the armed forces and the mining sector. In October, the court ordered the arrest of Cellou Baldé, a supporter of the junta and leader of the Union of Democratic Forces.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations are generally opaque although the Condé administration had made some progress regarding budget transparency. A 2010 access to information law was never implemented, and the National Assembly voted in favor of a new version in 2020.

In July 2022, the CNT debated a three-year budget proposal (2023–25) from the junta-led government. There has otherwise been very little effort by the interim government to facilitate or permit transparent debate about the budget.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 23 / 60 (−1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16 (−1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4 (−1)

The transitional charter commits to freedom and independence of the media, but in practice media freedom remains restricted. In 2022, several critical journalists reportedly faced arbitrary arrests, intimidation, questioning, and censorship by the security forces. Conakry's new rulers have frequently called on the national communication authority (HAC) to issue suspensions against outlets that provided critical coverage. In addition, individual units of the military have visited the offices of newspapers and radio stations that produced critical reports, and intimidated journalists. The junta has further managed to skew media coverage in favor of the transitional authorities by selectively offering financial support. Separately, there were reports in 2022 that journalists covering demonstrations against the junta were attacked by protesters armed with rocks and knives.

Previous laws permitting criminal defamation and prosecutions under broad cybersecurity measures remain on the books.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to increased harassment of journalists by junta authorities.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious rights are generally respected in practice. Some non-Muslim government workers have reported occasional discrimination. People who convert from Islam to Christianity sometimes encounter pressure from their community.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom has historically been subject to political restrictions under authoritarian regimes. The problem was less severe under the 2010–21 civilian government, though self-censorship still reduced the vibrancy of academic discourse. The coup of September 2021 has neither worsened nor improved the relationship between academic freedom and executive power.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Ethnic tensions and laws restricting freedom of expression may deter open debate in some circumstances. The junta does not officially restrict private discussions. However, state-led repression against dissenting voices and attempts to sideline critical media outlets have triggered widespread hesitation to express personal views for fears of surveillance or retribution.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Article 34 establishes the freedom of assembly in the transitional charter, but in May 2022 a decree by the military junta banned demonstrations that have the potential to disturb public order. The junta used the decree to outlaw any demonstration that is critical of the government. In October the security forces used live ammunition against protesters and detained numerous FNDC sympathizers. Nevertheless, despite the risk of injury and persecution, protest marches against the government continued to take place throughout 2022.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Civil society is weak and subject to periodic interference and intimidation. Nongovernmental organization (NGO) workers and activists have faced threats, harassment, and imprisonment. Guinean NGOs also suffer from poor access to funding, leadership struggles, the restriction of civic space, and security concerns.

Civil society representatives are represented in the CNT under the September 2021 transitional charter. Many such organizations in the CNT are said to be supportive of President Doumbouya.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Although workers are allowed to form trade unions, strike, and bargain collectively, they must provide 10 days' notice before striking, and strikes are banned in broadly defined essential services. In practice, unions are relatively active and constitute the core of civil society. The Condé (2010–21) and the Doumbouya (since 2021) administrations have attempted to divide unions seen as posing a potential threat to the authority of the government.

Several unions are represented in the CNT.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judicial system remains subject to political influence and corruption and is generally understaffed and lacks transparency. The judiciary suffers from a lack of resources and personnel.

Shortly after overthrowing Condé, junta leader Doumbouya ordered the return of cars and properties from judges who approved Conde's third term. Apart from the creation of a new anticorruption court there has been no substantial reform of the judiciary since the 2021 coup.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The junta released political detainees imprisoned by Condé. However, in 2022 security forces under the junta carried out their own arbitrary arrests and detentions. Due process is upheld unevenly in the state justice system, and many disputes are settled informally through traditional justice systems.

Security personnel implicated in abuses during the 2020 electoral periods did not face significant judicial scrutiny, due in part to limited institutional capacity and the unwillingness of witnesses to participate in subsequent proceedings.

Most of the incarcerated population consists of people in prolonged pretrial detention.

In September 2022, the trial against former junta leader Moussa Dadis Camara and other alleged perpetrators of the 2009 Conakry stadium massacre started; interim President Doumbouya had ordered the trial. The victims were not guaranteed protection for testimony against the accused perpetrators. The proceedings are being monitored by the International Criminal Court (ICC), which signed a memorandum of understanding with the Doumbouya administration. Media coverage of the trial was shown on television without restriction.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Security forces have engaged in torture and other forms of physical violence with apparent impunity.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Women face pervasive societal discrimination and disadvantages in both the formal and traditional justice systems. Various ethnic groups engage in mutual discrimination with respect to hiring and other matters. Antidiscrimination laws do not protect LGBT+ people. Same-sex sexual activity is a criminal offense that can be punished with up to three years in prison. Although this law is rarely enforced, LGBT+ people have been arrested on lesser charges in connection with their identity.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Rampant crime and the lack of employment opportunities remain important informal impediments to freedom of movement and ability to seek new employment. Temporary restrictions on movement implemented in 2020 in response to the COVID-19 pandemic were no longer in place at the end of 2022.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

In principle there are avenues to document property rights and ownership, and following recent reforms, property registration processes have become faster and less expensive. However, the legal and administrative system responsible for enforcing ownership rights is ineffective and corrupt. In 2022, the junta expropriated a number of properties in the capital.

Women face gender-based disadvantages in laws and practices governing inheritance and property rights.

Rape and domestic violence are common but underreported due to fears of stigmatization, and there no specific legislation addresses domestic abuse. Female genital mutilation (FGM) is common despite a legal ban; in 2016, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights reported that 69 percent of 20- to 24-year-old women were subjected to FGM before their 10th birthday. The 2016 criminal code set the legal age for marriage at 18, but early and forced marriages have remained common. A civil marriage is required by the civil code prior to a traditional or religious marriage ceremony, but enforcement of this requirement is rare.

In 2019, the parliament amended the civil code to make monogamy the general regime of marriage, except when there is "explicit agreement" on polygamy from the first wife.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Workers in the informal sectors do not enjoy work-related protections. Income generated from the exploitation of the mining sector benefit those in power. In some mining areas, child labor is a major problem.

The 2016 criminal code specifically criminalized trafficking in persons and debt bondage, but reduced the minimum penalties for such crimes, and enforcement has been weak. Women and children are sometimes trafficked for sexual exploitation to other parts of West Africa, Europe, the Middle East, and the United States. The military coup of September 2021 diverted attention and administrative capacity away from existing programs to combat child labor and human trafficking.

Guinea-Bissau

Population: 2,100,000
Capital: Bissau
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Guinea-Bissau's political system has been hampered in recent years by divisions between the president and the parliament, and within the main political party. Conditions for civil liberties have gradually improved as the country has recovered from the aftermath of a military coup in 2012, though police continue to disrupt some demonstrations. Corruption is a major problem that has been exacerbated by organized criminal activity, including drug trafficking.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In February, a group of armed men attacked the government palace, where President Umaro Sissoco Embaló was leading a cabinet meeting; Embaló was unhurt, but officials reported that 11 people were killed during the alleged coup attempt. Embaló described the attack as an assassination attempt, and claimed it was connected to the government's fight against drug trafficking.
- In response to the February attack, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) deployed a "stabilization force" to Guinea-Bissau in June to help protect government institutions and prevent further violence. Several of Embaló's opponents expressed doubts that the attack represented a genuine coup attempt; some suggested that Embaló may have orchestrated the coup himself, possibly in the hope that ECOWAS would send troops to help his government keep power.
- President Embaló dissolved the parliament in May, accusing its members of corruption, and appointed an interim government in June; the country's largest opposition party, the African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cabo Verde (PAIGC), was excluded from the transitional government after failing to reach an agreement with Embaló on the party's participation. New parliamentary elections were initially planned for December, but were later postponed until 2023.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 17 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The president is elected through a two-round voting system for up to two consecutive terms of five years. The prime minister is appointed by the president "in accordance with the election results" after consulting with the parliamentary parties, and the government must be dissolved if the parliament rejects its proposed budget.

Umaro Sissoco Embaló of the Movement for Democratic Alternation (Madem G15) party and a coalition of opposition parties, won the December 2019 presidential election's runoff with 53.6 percent of the vote, defeating Domingos Simões Pereira of the African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cabo Verde (PAIGC), who won 46.4 percent of the vote. According to the National Election Commission (CNE), voter turnout was 72.7 percent. The African Union's (AU) election observation mission found that the administration of the runoff vote was free and transparent, despite challenges with the first round of voting. International bodies such as the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) acknowledged Embaló's victory in April 2020. The Supreme Court ultimately rejected an appeal by Pereira that September.

In February 2022, a group of armed men opened fire on the government palace, where the president was holding a cabinet meeting. The president was unharmed by the assailants, and remained in power following the incident, which has been labeled an attempted coup. Embaló has called the attack an assassination attempt, and claimed it was planned by drug traffickers. Several people arrested in connection with the attack remained awaiting trial at year's end.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Members of the 102-seat National People's Assembly are elected by popular vote for four-year terms. In the March 2019 elections, the PAIGC remained the largest single party with 47 seats, though it lost its outright majority. Madem G15 won 27, the Party of Social Renewal (PRS) took 21, the United People's Assembly–Democratic Party of Guinea-Bissau (APU-PDGB) took 5, and the Union for Change (UM) and the Party for a New Democracy (PND) each secured a single seat.

In May 2022, President Embaló dissolved the parliament, accusing its members of corruption and citing "insurmountable differences" between the body and other branches of government. An interim government was appointed in June; the PAIGC, which could not reach an agreement with Embaló on taking part in a national unity executive, was excluded from the transitional government. New parliamentary elections were initially planned for December, but were later postponed until June 2023.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

There are some problems with the country's electoral laws and framework, including weak controls on campaign spending, vote buying, and a lack of legal provisions for domestic poll observers. Elections have been subject to delays in recent years, due in part to lack of funding and stalled voter registration processes.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 8 / 16

There are no major constraints on party formation. Dozens of political parties are active in Guinea-Bissau, and 21 competed in the 2019 parliamentary elections, up from 15 in 2014. However, the political crisis since 2015—when former president Vaz dismissed then prime minister Pereira—has led to some instances of violence and intimidation among partisan groups.

PAIGC leader and former presidential candidate Pereira was repeatedly prevented from leaving Guinea-Bissau on dubious grounds during 2022. The government initially claimed that Pereira was barred from leaving the country because he was the subject of an ongoing judicial investigation. However, authorities continued to prevent Pereira from leaving the country in September, even after a court order revoked earlier restraining measures that had required him to stay in Guinea-Bissau. Pereira was ultimately allowed to leave the country later that month.

During 2022, the PAIGC was repeatedly blocked from holding a party conference, which was initially scheduled to be held in February. In February, PAIGC militant Bolom Conté legally challenged Pereira's right to organize the congress, saying that his mandate as party leader had ended; the court sided with Conté, and issued an order forbidding the party to hold its congress. The court order was enforced in March when police violently raided PAIGC headquarters to prevent the congress from occurring, wounding at least seven people and arresting several others. Pereira accused President Embaló of pressuring the judiciary to block the congress, which was ultimately held in November and saw Pereira reelected as party leader.

In May 2022, UM party leader Agnelo Regala was shot at outside his home by unknown individuals. The Attorney General's Office (PGR) announced that the matter would be investigated.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4

Guinea-Bissau has a limited record of democratic power transfers between rival political parties, as the PAIGC or military rulers have governed for most of the period since independence. In 2014, Vaz succeeded an independent who had served as acting president in the wake of the 2012 coup. Nevertheless, opposition forces increased their representation in the 2019 legislative elections. President Embaló of the new party Madem G15 succeeded former president Vaz of the PAIGC following the 2019 presidential election. However, Embaló's use of the military to complete his installation in office raised concerns.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The military has apparently refrained from interfering in politics since 2014, though it was used by President Embaló to complete his installment in office. The choices of voters and politicians continue to be influenced by corruption and patronage networks. Organized crime linked to drug trafficking and money laundering has contributed to the country's political instability in recent decades.

In February 2022, while President Embaló was leading a cabinet meeting at the government palace, a group of armed men surrounded the building and opened fire. Officials reported that 11 people—mostly government security personnel—were killed during the alleged coup attempt. Several people were arrested in connection with the attack, which Embaló claimed was planned by drug traffickers. The trial of 25 people allegedly involved in the attack was initially scheduled to take place in December, but had been postponed as of year's end.

Several of Embaló's opponents—including PAIGC leader Pereira and Luís Vaz Martins, the former president of the Guinean League of Human Rights (LGDH)—have expressed doubts that the attack represented a genuine coup attempt. Some analysts believe Embaló may have orchestrated the coup himself, possibly in the hope that ECOWAS would send troops to help keep his government in power. In response to the February attack, an ECOWAS "stabilization force" was deployed to Guinea-Bissau in June to help local law enforcement protect public officials and government institutions and prevent further violence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women enjoy equal political rights, but cultural obstacles limit their participation in practice, and they are underrepresented in leadership positions. Just 14 women won seats in the March 2019 parliamentary elections. A 2018 law requires 36 percent of candidates on party lists to be women.

Ethnicity plays a role in politics, reducing the extent to which all groups' interests are represented. For example, one of the country's larger ethnic groups, the Balanta, has traditionally dominated the military and cast votes for the PRS.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Governance has been impaired by the political crisis that began in 2015, and election delays have undermined the democratic legitimacy of incumbent officials. The original term of the parliament that was replaced by the March 2019 elections had expired nearly a year earlier. The full legislature has convened only sporadically in recent years.

In early 2020, a constitutional crisis emerged when Embaló organized his inauguration unconstitutionally. The PAIGC, which had a slim parliamentary majority but lost the presidential election, ignored Embaló's inauguration and appointed an interim president, Cipriano Cassamá. However, Cassamá resigned after one day in office, saying he feared for his safety. Embaló was eventually recognized by the parliament.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is pervasive, including among senior government figures. Both military and civilian officials have been accused of involvement in the illegal drug trade. Critics of past corruption investigations targeting former high-ranking officials have argued that they were politically motivated.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

There are no effective legal provisions to facilitate public access to government information, and government officials do not disclose their personal financial information as required by law. The political impasse and related parliamentary dysfunction have further obstructed oversight of government spending in recent years. The lack of transparency contributes to chronic budget shortfalls, frequent delays in public-sector wages, and doubts about the management of foreign assistance.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 26 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of the press, and there is some media diversity. However, journalists regularly face harassment and intimidation, including pressure regarding their coverage from political figures and government officials. Journalists and media facilities have been the target of violence.

In recent years, armed men—some dressed in military clothing—have repeatedly attacked the privately owned Radio Capital FM station, which is allied to the opposition PAIGC, vandalizing its offices and destroying broadcasting equipment. In one such attack in February 2022, several people were injured while fleeing from the assailants, who were firing weapons in the broadcaster's office.

Privately owned radio stations are subject to steep annual licensing fees; nonpayment of fees can incur harsh criminal penalties, including up to three years' imprisonment for the station's owner. In April 2022, the government ordered the closure of 79 radio stations for nonpayment of broadcast licensing fees. The country's journalists' union denounced the closures as an attack on press freedom. All but two of the stations resumed broadcasting later that month after civil society organizations helped them negotiate staggered payments to the government.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious freedom is legally protected and usually respected in practice. Government licensing requirements are not onerous and are often disregarded. Some Muslims have reportedly raised concerns about the influence of foreign imams who preach a more rigorous or austere form of Islam, threatening religious tolerance.

In July 2022, a Catholic church in the city of Gabú was vandalized by a group of unknown individuals. Though both Christian and Islamic groups in Guinea-Bissau condemned the attack, President Embaló controversially dismissed the crime as inconsequential. Police opened an investigation into the incident, but the perpetrators had not been held accountable as of December.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is guaranteed and generally upheld, though the education system is poor in terms of access, quality, and basic resources. Public schools were closed for much of 2018 and 2019 due to ongoing teachers' strikes, and in 2020 and 2021 as a consequence of COVID-19 restrictions.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Individuals are relatively free to express their views on political topics in the private and social sphere, though some more public figures have faced the threat of arrest or charges in retaliation for their remarks in recent years.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedom of assembly is frequently restricted. The authorities repeatedly interfere with demonstrations linked to the political tensions between the presidency and the legislature. The state of emergency enforced due to the COVID-19 pandemic banned assemblies of more than 25 people during 2020. The restrictions were prolonged by President Embaló for most of 2021 and prevented protesters from gathering during a period of high political tension.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally able to operate. Some groups have faced intimidation and other obstacles, particularly those that are associated with street demonstrations.

Several activists who criticized the government reported facing harassment, arbitrary detentions, and physical assaults throughout 2021, including Luís Vaz Martins—a lawyer and the former president of the LGDH—who was the target of an assassination attempt that August. Martins accused the president of ordering the attack.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers are allowed to form and join independent trade unions, but few work in the wage-earning formal sector. Private employers sometimes engage in improper interference with union organizing and other activities. The right to strike is protected, and government workers frequently exercise it.

Several strikes took place during 2022, with workers protesting against unpaid wages and poor working conditions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Judges are highly susceptible to corruption and political pressure, and the court system as a whole lacks the resources and capacity to function effectively.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Corruption is common among police, and officers often fail to observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. Very few criminal cases are brought to trial or successfully prosecuted, partly due to the limited material and human resources available to investigators. Most of the population lacks access to the justice system in practice.

In November 2022, government critic Marcelino Ntupé, acting legal representative for 18 people accused of taking part in the alleged coup attempt in February, was kidnapped from his home and severely beaten by a group of armed men. The president condemned the attack, which the LGDH attributed to "institutional violence" in the country.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Conditions in prisons and detention centers are often extremely poor, and law enforcement personnel generally enjoy impunity for abuses. Because of its weak institutions and porous borders, Guinea-Bissau has become a transit point for criminal organizations trafficking various types of contraband. The armed forces and other state entities have been linked to drug trafficking. In recent years, authorities have made some progress in combating the drug trade and organized crime.

A low-intensity conflict in Senegal's Casamance region occasionally affects security across the border in Guinea-Bissau, where Senegalese rebels sometimes operate.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Women face significant societal discrimination and traditional biases, despite some legal protections. They generally do not receive equal pay for similar work and have fewer opportunities for education and employment.

There are virtually no effective legal protections against discrimination on other grounds, including ethnicity, sexual orientation, and gender identity, though same-sex relations are not specifically criminalized.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

There are few formal restrictions on freedom of movement, but widespread corruption among police and other public officials can limit this right in practice, as can criminal activity. At times, Senegalese rebel activity may restrict movement in the border area.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Illegal economic activity, including logging, by organized groups remains a problem. The quality of enforcement of property rights is generally poor, and the formal procedures for establishing a business are relatively onerous.

Women, particularly those from certain ethnic groups in rural areas, face restrictions on their ability to own and inherit property.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

There are multiple constraints on personal social freedoms. Early and forced marriages remain common, especially in rural areas. The government, international organizations, and community leaders have worked to eliminate female genital mutilation (FGM), though nearly half of the country's women have suffered from such violence. Despite the existence of legislation to address gender-based violence, the problem is reportedly widespread; victims of rape and domestic abuse rarely report the crimes to authorities.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Guinea-Bissau is one of the world's poorest countries, with most families relying on unstable employment in the informal economy or remittances from migrant workers abroad. Public services have deteriorated in recent years amid irregular payment of public-sector workers.

Boys are vulnerable to organized exploitation through forced begging and to forced labor in sectors including mining and agriculture. A rising number of Muslim children from Guinea-Bissau are trafficked by money-making schemes disguised as religious Quranic schools, particularly into Senegal.

Girls are frequently victims of sexual exploitation or domestic servitude. Government officials have been accused of complicity in trafficking activity, including sex tourism schemes in the Bijagós islands.

Guyana

Population: 800,000
Capital: Georgetown
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Guyana is a parliamentary democracy with a lively press and a robust civil society. However, elections held in 2020 were marred by attempted fraud. Crime, police violence and corruption, and discrimination against Indigenous and LGBT+ people remain significant problems. The exploitation of offshore oil and natural gas reserves has raised the stakes of anticorruption reforms and stoked ethnopolitical divisions.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In November, the National Assembly passed a bill to establish a Constitutional Reform Commission to boost minority rights and improve the electoral framework.
- A presidential commission of inquiry into the 2020 elections began proceedings in November.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 30 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president, who serves as both chief of state and head of government, appoints the cabinet, though ministers are collectively responsible to the National Assembly. Parties designate a presidential candidate ahead of National Assembly elections, with the winning party's candidate assuming the presidency for a maximum of two five-year terms.

Long-delayed elections held in March 2020 were marred by serious attempted fraud. The High Court ordered a recount, but political and courtroom maneuvering continued for months until the government of then president David Granger ultimately accepted the results of a recount showing that Irfaan Ali of the People's Progressive Party/Civic (PPP/C) had won the presidency. Ali took his post that August.

Members of the unicameral, 65-seat National Assembly are elected to five-year terms; 25 representatives are elected in 10 geographical constituencies, while 40 are elected by proportional representation nationally. Up to seven unelected cabinet ministers and parliamentary officials may also hold ex officio seats.

In the 2020 elections, the PPP/C won 33 seats, Granger's coalition of A Partnership for National Unity (APNU) and the Alliance for Change (AFC) won 31, and a coalition of opposition parties was allocated 1 seat. European Union (EU) observers said the campaign was competitive and generally free, although polarization, unregulated campaign finance, and a lack of transparency characterized the preelectoral period. The EU observers said the poll's integrity was "seriously compromised" by the manipulation of results by senior Guyana Elections Commission (GECOM) officials. The eventual allocation of seats was based on a recount approved by Caribbean Community observers.

Although observers characterized the 2020 polls as generally free, EU observers described GECOM as dysfunctional, polarized, opaque, and derelict in its duty to stop its officials from interfering with the results. In August 2021, GECOM dismissed Chief Elections Officer Keith Lowenfield—who had been accused of abetting the fraudulent vote tabulation in 2020—along with his deputy and a regional officer.

A presidential COI into the 2020 elections began proceedings in November 2022.

The same month, the National Assembly passed a bill proposed by the government in August 2022 to establish a Constitutional Reform Commission (CRC) to make recommendations about several major constitutional issues including electoral reforms.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

Political parties may form freely and they generally operate without interference. The APNU is predominantly Afro-Guyanese while the PPP/C is mainly Indo-Guyanese. Ethnopolitical divisions have sharpened amid the influx of oil and gas revenue. New parties emerged to contest the 2020 elections, gaining one shared seat. Independent candidates cannot legally stand for the presidency.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The PPP/C ruled from 1992 to 2015, and the APNU-AFC coalition from 2015 to 2020. The PPP/C took power through elections in 2020, but significant pressure from the international community was required to ensure a declaration of the PPP/C as the winner based on the results of a recount.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Voters are largely free to make their own political choices. However, there is concern that politics may be improperly influenced by the largely Indo-Guyanese economic elite.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women and ethnic minorities have equal political rights under the law. At least a third of each party's candidate list must consist of women. Women gained 25 of the National Assembly's 65 elected and 5 ex officio seats in 2020.

Indigenous people, who make up about 10 percent of the population, are politically marginalized. In 2020, Indigenous activist and Liberty and Justice Party (LJP) founder Lenox Shuman ran for president. Later that year, Shuman became the first Indigenous deputy speaker of the National Assembly.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The president and the legislative majority are generally able to create and implement policy without improper interference. There are signs that the post-2020 political impasse is thawing. In May 2022, President Ali met officially with opposition leader Aubrey Norton of the APNU-AFC for the first time, to discuss several long-vacant judicial and official appointments.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

In recent years, successive governments have introduced safeguards against corruption, notably by strengthening money-laundering controls and empowering a new agency to audit state-owned companies. However, graft remains widespread, and the exploitation of offshore oil and natural gas reserves is adding urgency to the need for effective anticorruption reforms.

In July, Transparency Institute Guyana Inc. (TIGI) called on the government to officially investigate allegations of corruption concerning Vice President Bharrat Jagdeo that surfaced in a report by US-based Vice News.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Laws designed to ensure government transparency are inconsistently upheld. A 2013 Access to Information Act allows the government to refuse requests with little or no justification.

In May 2022, a board was appointed to the government integrity commission tasked with reviewing officials' asset disclosures after its posts had remained vacant for over a year.

Also in May 2022, the government released its third report for the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative, covering fiscal year 2019.

Critics have suggested that the government's initial set of oil contracts, negotiated privately with individual companies, are unfavorable to Guyana. A Natural Resource Fund (NRF) bill was passed in December 2021, restructuring systems put in place in 2019 to manage oil revenue. The bill establishes an oversight committee independent from the Ministry of Finance to boost transparency. It also requires that all reports of petroleum revenues be published in the Official Gazette within three months, with failure to do so punishable by stiff fines and lengthy prison terms. Critics have nevertheless suggested that the process for appointments to the NRF board and openings for Ministry of Finance influence over the fund could dent its independence.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 43 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Although freedom of the press is generally respected, government officials have filed defamation cases against journalists. Criminal defamation charges can be punishable by up to two years in prison.

The Guyana National Broadcasting Authority, whose board is appointed by the president, has been accused of partisan bias in regulatory and licensing decisions. The state-owned Guyana Chronicle has also been accused of progovernment bias, including in December 2022 by the Guyana Public Service Union (GPSU).

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice. Rules limiting visas for foreign missionaries and barring blasphemous libel are not actively enforced.

The Ali administration has indicated that faith groups will have representation on the CRC.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is largely upheld.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to express their views without fear of retaliation, surveillance, or other repercussions. During June 2022 protests in the East Coast Demerara Region, President Ali claimed a demonstrator had been filmed threatening his life and indicated he would seek a parliamentary resolution "decrying political violence and threats of assassination."

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The authorities generally uphold the right to peaceful assembly. A protest against police violence in the East Coast Demerara Region in June 2022 proceeded without interference or subsequent arrests, despite some protesters allegedly attacking street vendors and looting.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely. The government has consulted with NGOs on various policy initiatives, including measures designed to combat human trafficking.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The rights to form labor unions, bargain collectively, and strike are generally upheld, and unions are well organized. However, laws against antiunion discrimination are poorly enforced.

In April 2022, union members protested low wages and the high cost of living, and criticized the Ali administration for failing to restore a collective bargaining agreement removed by a previous government. The GPSU criticized the government for failing to engage in collective bargaining with public sector workers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The courts are impaired by political disputes, staff shortages, and lack of resources. The president must obtain the agreement of the opposition leader to appoint the chancellor of the judiciary and the chief justice. Both positions were held by acting placeholders in 2022; Guyana has gone without a confirmed chancellor and chief justice for 17 and 21 years, respectively.

Other judges are appointed by the president on the advice of a Judicial Service Commission (JSC), which is also selected with opposition input. The JSC has remained unstaffed since 2017.

Guyanese courts played a mixed role during the 2020 election crisis. The APNU-AFC continues to challenge the legality of the elections; a petition was admitted by the Court of Appeal in October 2022.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Observance of due process safeguards is uneven. Defendants are often held in pretrial detention beyond their maximum possible sentence; about 27 percent of the prison population were awaiting trial as of September 2022. Prisons are also overcrowded.

Police officers do not always operate with professionalism; some have reportedly accepted bribes and committed a variety of other crimes.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Reports of police violence, abuse of detainees, and harsh prison conditions persist. An undercover police officer in Region 4 allegedly shot and killed Quindon Bacchus, a young man and resident of Haslington, in June 2022, sparking protests and a riot; three police officers were arrested in July in connection with the case. The rate of violent crime has fallen somewhat in recent years but remains stubbornly high.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Indo-Guyanese people, who make up 40 percent of the population, predominate in business. The organization of politics along ethnic lines makes communal violence a perennial concern.

Laws barring discrimination based on race, gender, and other categories are not effectively enforced. Women continue to suffer from workplace bias and significantly lower pay.

Guyana's nine principal Indigenous groups still face disparities in health care, education, and justice.

Guyana's Prevention of Discrimination Act of 1997 does not mention sexual orientation or gender identity. Same-sex sexual activity is punishable with harsh jail terms, and the LGBT+ community faces discrimination and police harassment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

There are no undue legal restrictions on freedom of movement, including with respect to residency, employment, and education. However, factors including bribery, racial polarization, and neglected infrastructure in some regions limit this right in practice.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The legal framework generally supports the rights to own property and operate private businesses, but complex regulations are unevenly enforced, and corruption and organized crime sometimes inhibit business activity.

Indigenous peoples face unauthorized encroachment and resource exploitation by outsiders. In September 2021, President Ali announced that the Amerindian Act of 2006 would be revised with a view to bolstering Indigenous land rights, and the government allocated funding for the project in July 2022.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Individual freedom on matters such as marriage and divorce is generally respected, though same-sex marriage and civil unions are prohibited. Marriage before age 18 is allowed with judicial or parental permission and is common. Domestic abuse is widespread, and conviction rates are low.

An 1893 law prohibiting cross-dressing was overturned in August 2021 following a 2018 Caribbean Court of Justice ruling.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Legal protections against exploitative working conditions are not enforced consistently. Those working in the informal sector and extractive industries in the country's interior are particularly vulnerable to abuses.

Haiti

Population: 11,600,000
Capital: Port-au-Prince
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Worsening breakdowns of the Haitian electoral system in recent years have led to a series of expired mandates and constitutional impasses, leaving citizens without proper political representation. The government's ability to function was further impacted by the 2021 assassination of President Jovenel Moïse; Prime Minister Ariel Henry, whom Moïse appointed before his death, rules by decree. Rampant corruption and violence by armed criminal groups undermine basic services and contribute to pervasive physical insecurity. The judiciary and law enforcement agencies lack the resources, independence, and integrity to uphold due process and the rule of law and are additionally targeted by criminal groups. Antigovernment protests often result in excessive use of force by police.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In July, an alliance of criminal gangs fought other groups for control of Nan Brooklyn, an area that sits within the Cité Soleil section of Port-au-Prince. By late July, some 300 people were killed.
- In September, that same alliance blocked access to the country's main fuel terminal after the government of Ariel Henry announced that it would reduce fuel subsidies. The government reclaimed control of the terminal in November after reportedly negotiating with the occupying group.
- In October, Henry called on the international community to send troops into Haiti to address the country's security situation. While some governments considered the request and UN officials called on member states to provide assistance, no such force was deployed by year's end.
- In late December, Henry signed an agreement with a group of business and civil society actors that called for elections in 2023 and the installation of an elected government in 2024. A copy of that agreement was not published in Le Moniteur, the government's official newspaper, by year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 11 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

In Haiti's semipresidential system, the president is directly elected for a five-year term. The prime minister is appointed by the president and confirmed by Parliament. Jovenel Moïse of the Haitian Tèt Kale Party (PHTK), the handpicked successor of then president Michel Martelly, won the 2015 presidential election, but the results were nullified due to extensive fraud. Moïse went on to win a repeat election in 2016, taking 55.6 percent of the vote. The events surrounding the repeat election later resulted in a political and legal dispute over whether Moïse's term expired in February 2021, five years after the end of Martelly's term, or February 2022, five years after Moïse was inaugurated.

Moïse frequently replaced the prime minister during his tenure, but after the terms of most lawmakers expired in early 2020, his appointees were unable to obtain parliamentary approval in keeping with the constitution. After Prime Minister Claude Joseph submitted his resignation in early July 2021, Moïse appointed Ariel Henry as Joseph's successor through a decree published in the official state newspaper Le Moniteur.

Henry had not yet been installed when, days later, Moïse was assassinated at his residence. The assassination set off a dispute among local political, civic, and economic actors as to who should head the executive branch, but key diplomatic representatives in the country—known as the Core Group—called on Henry to lead the government, and Joseph stepped down. That September, Henry dismissed the Provisional Electoral Council (CEP) and postponed already-overdue general elections.

Although his role as head of government is contested due to his suspected involvement in Moïse's assassination, Henry rules with support from the international community; the UN Security Council accepted Henry's decision to postpone elections and dismiss the CEP in 2021. Polls may take place in 2023 under an agreement reached between Henry and civil society actors in December 2022.

The directly elected, bicameral Parliament is composed of a Senate, with 30 members who serve six-year terms, and a Chamber of Deputies, with 119 members who serve four-year terms. The 2015 legislative elections were plagued by disorder, fraud, and violence; runoff polls held in 2016 were marred by fraud and low turnout. The PHTK emerged as the single largest party in both chambers, followed by Vérité (Truth).

Parliament was dissolved in 2020 after parliamentary and local elections were cancelled in late 2019. The 10 senators who still had mandates supported Senate president Joseph Lambert's short-lived bid to serve as acting president after Moïse's assassination. The remaining senators' mandates will expire in January 2023. Local government officials also operate without a mandate, with mayors being reappointed or leaving office in 2020.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The CEP was established in the late 1980s as a temporary body but remains responsible for managing the electoral process. Despite constitutional safeguards against executive dominance of the CEP, the executive has asserted significant control in practice. In 2020, Moïse appointed a new CEP by presidential decree in a move that human rights observers called unconstitutional. Plans to hold a constitutional referendum and elections in 2021 were scuttled that September; Henry dismissed the CEP and pledged to assemble a new council with broader legitimacy. A new CEP was not formed in 2022, however.

In 2021, political and civil society leaders produced the Montana Accord, under which a transitional government would preside over new polls. The accord did not win the immediate support of the PHTK and other stakeholders, however. In late December 2022, Henry signed on to a document with a different group of civil society and business actors. That agreement envisioned a 14-month transition period, 2023 polls, and the 2024 installation of a democratically elected government. A copy of that agreement was not published in Le Moniteur by year's end.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16

Legal and administrative barriers that prevented some parties from registering or running in past elections have largely been eliminated. The number of members required to form a political party was reduced from 500 to 20 in 2014, leading to the creation of dozens of parties. However, pervasive insecurity and criminal violence impair political activity. Opposition leaders are subject to threats and abductions, and protests organized by opposition parties are regularly met with repressive force by authorities. Political actors have long employed criminal gangs to impede their opponents, further restricting competition.

Criminal violence is pervasive. In December 2022, the UN Integrated Office in Haiti (BINUH) reported that over 1,200 kidnappings took place during the year, over twice as many as in 2021. Gangs continue to control neighborhoods and strategic roads connecting Port-au-Prince to the rest of the country.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

Haiti has a poor record of peaceful democratic transfers of power. It remains difficult for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections, which are regularly disrupted by violence, marred by accusations of fraud, and postponed. The PHTK consolidated power in the legislature and at the local level, in part through alliances with smaller parties, before national and local mandates expired.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Haitians' political choices are marginalized by corrupt patronage networks, organized crime, and foreign actors. Many politicians have relied on money linked to drug trafficking, gang activity, and other illegal sources to finance their campaigns. The PHTK and opposition parties have enlisted armed criminal groups to either incite or halt residents' involvement in protests and other political activities, according to local human rights activists.

Citizens' democratic autonomy was further harmed by the assassination of President Moïse and its aftermath. In addition to the violence and criminality associated with the murder itself, many observers decried the role of the Core Group—comprising ambassadors or representatives from Brazil, Canada, France, Germany, Spain, the United States, the European Union, the Organization of American States, and the United Nations—in accepting Henry as prime minister.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Haitian women are underrepresented in political life, with only four out of 149 parliamentary seats held by women from 2017 to 2019. The constitution mandates that 30 percent of public officials be women, but there are no penalties for noncompliance. Election-related violence and social and cultural norms discourage women from participating in politics. Due to societal discrimination, the interests of LGBT+ people are not represented in the political system, and there are no openly LGBT+ politicians.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Few national leaders who held office in 2022 were freely elected or appointed according to the constitution. Henry was selected by Moïse to become prime minister in 2021, but that appointment was not approved by Parliament, which was dissolved in 2020 as most of its members lost their electoral mandates. Before his assassination, Moïse attempted to rule by decree; the legitimacy of his actions was questioned, since only members of Parliament have the constitutional authority to pass laws. Henry has ruled by decree after Moïse's murder.

Corruption, instability, and security threats hinder the government's ability to carry out its own policies and provide basic services. In September, the G9 an Fanmi e Alye (Family and Allies) alliance of gangs blockaded the country's main fuel terminal after the Henry government announced a reduction in fuel subsidies. In October, Henry called for other countries to send troops into the country. While some governments publicly considered Henry's request and UN officials called on member states to provide assistance, no such force was deployed by year's end. The government reclaimed control of the terminal in November, after reportedly negotiating with the gang.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is widespread in Haiti, as are allegations of impunity for government officials. The country's anticorruption framework, meanwhile, has been weakened in recent years. A 2017 law reduced the independence and powers of the Central Financial Intelligence Unit (UCREF), which investigated money-laundering cases. Also in 2017, Moïse replaced the heads of the Anticorruption Unit (ULCC) and the UCREF with political allies and former members of the Michel Martelly administration. Under a 2020 decree, procurement-related opinions issued by the Superior Court of Audits and Administrative Disputes (CSCCA) were made advisory and nonbinding; earlier that year, that court released a report on official corruption involving a development-loan program operated by Venezuela.

In a report released in August 2022, the ULCC warned that corruption remained widespread in national and local government bodies.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Haitians' general distrust of the government stems in large part from the absence of transparency and accountability measures that are needed to reduce corruption. There are no access-to-information laws, and it is reportedly very difficult to obtain government documents and data in practice. All government officials must file financial disclosure forms within 90 days of taking office and within 90 days of leaving office, though these requirements are not well enforced and the reports are not made public. A 2020 presidential decree that created the National Intelligence Agency (ANI) granted it total secrecy and the ability to conduct surveillance on individuals and businesses at any time, even if there is no relevant ongoing investigation.

In 2021, Henry dismissed the justice minister and a chief prosecutor after investigators under their supervision uncovered evidence that appeared to link Henry to a top suspect in the Moïse assassination, prompting accusations that he was obstructing justice. The investigation remained stalled at year's end.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 20 / 60 (−2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16 (−1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4 (−1)

The constitution includes protections for press freedom, and the media sector is pluralistic, but the work of journalists is constrained by threats and violence, government interference, and a lack of financial resources. Attacks on journalists occur frequently, and impunity for perpetrators is the norm.

According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), seven journalists or media workers were murdered, died conducting a dangerous assignment, or died in other circumstances in 2022. In early January, for example, Wilguens Louis-Saint and John Wesley Amady were killed in Port-au-Prince, likely by gang members, while reporting on criminal activity. In September, a group of journalists reporting on gang violence in Port-au-Prince were ambushed, reportedly by members of the G9 an Fanmi e Alye; Frantzen Charles and Tayson Lartigue were killed and their bodies reportedly burned.

Journalists also died when security forces tried to disperse protests. In February 2022, journalist Maximilien Lazard was shot as police used live ammunition on protesters in Port-au-Prince and later died at a hospital. Police in Port-au-Prince used tear gas to disperse a group of journalists who protested the detention of another journalist in October; Romelson Vilcin of Radio Génération 80 was struck by a tear-gas canister and killed, while police beat several protesters.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because journalists have faced mistreatment and violence at the hands of Haitian authorities and criminal actors throughout the year.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed, and religious groups generally practice freely. However, the traditionally dominant Roman Catholic and Protestant churches and schools receive certain privileges from the state, while Vodou religious leaders have experienced social stigmatization and violence for their beliefs and practices. The government has denied registration to the country's small Muslim communities.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Educational institutions and academics choose their curriculum freely, but university associations and student groups that protest government actions are often met with police violence. Academic freedom is also negatively affected by the general climate of insecurity, and some scholars may self-censor to avoid conflicts with powerful groups or individuals.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

There are some formal constraints on the expression of personal views, including criminal defamation laws. The risk of violent reprisal also serves as a deterrent to unfettered discussion of sensitive issues such as corruption, gangs, and organized crime. The government has been accused of using criminal gangs to help suppress dissent. Private discussion is also constrained by the risk of kidnapping, which is a common occurrence in Haiti.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally enshrined but often violated in practice. Police have used excessive force including live rounds of ammunition to disperse protesters. Despite the risk of violence, politicians, civil society groups, and ordinary citizens continued to mount demonstrations in 2022, calling for Henry to step down and condemning criminal activity.

Police regularly responded with force during the year. In October 2022, for example, protesters in the capital assembled to object to the Henry government's call for foreign intervention; police used tear gas in response. At least one person died, with other participants saying the police were responsible.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Numerous domestic and international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in Haiti, but human rights defenders and activists who address sensitive topics are subject to threats and violence, which creates a climate of fear. The National Human Rights Defense Network (RNDDH) claimed that a gang leader and a politician plotted to kill its director in a March 2022 meeting.

Violence against activists is rarely investigated or prosecuted. Among other high-profile cases, the 2020 assassination of Port-au-Prince Bar Association head Monferrier Dorval remained unsolved in 2022.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The right to unionize is legally protected and strikes are not uncommon. However, the union movement in Haiti is weak and lacks collective bargaining power in practice. Most citizens are informally employed. Workers who engage in union activity frequently face harassment, suspension, termination, and other repercussions from employers. In February 2022, factory workers protested over pay in Port-au-Prince. Garment workers protested that same month.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The Haitian judiciary faces a multitude of challenges including corruption, safety concerns, a lack of accountability, political interference, and arbitrariness in operations, rendering the justice system ineffective by any standard. As president, Jovenel Moïse made judicial appointments beyond the authority of his office and interfered with judges who investigated politically sensitive matters. In February 2022, the Ministry of Justice attempted to illegally nominate judges to the Supreme Court. Under the constitution, judges sitting on that court must be named by the president from a list provided by the Senate. The Supreme Court last met in February, though Henry appointed a new president for that court in November.

After Moïse's 2021 assassination, a number of judges assigned to the case resigned for security-related reasons. Other officials who were involved in the investigation received death threats. A fifth judge was assigned to the case in May 2022. In its October report to the UN Security Council, the BINUH reported that a legal deadline in the case had nevertheless been missed.

Security concerns affected other courts in 2022. In June, gangs took control of the Court of First Instance in Port-au-Prince. Judges and lawyers who fled reported that files were lost during that incident. Lawyers had sought to avoid that court, which is near gang-controlled territory, and called on the government to move it for safety reasons. In its October report, the BINUH noted that police had to patrol the CSCCA after that court received threats.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutionally protected due process rights are regularly violated in practice. Arbitrary arrest is common, as are extortion attempts by police and at all levels of the legal system. Most suspects do not have legal representation, and even those who do suffer from long delays and case mismanagement. In 2021, the BINUH said 82 percent of all detainees were held on a pretrial basis. Many have never appeared before a judge despite the legal requirement of a court hearing within 48 hours of arrest; in some cases, detainees have waited years for a trial.

In 2020, President Moïse published two decrees that expanded the definition of terrorism and created the ANI to gather information on and prevent terrorist acts that ostensibly threaten national security. Human rights groups criticized the vague new definition of "terrorist act," which included robbery, extortion, arson, and the destruction of public and private goods. According to the decrees, the ANI would have broad discretion to conduct searches and surveillance, and its staff cannot be held legally accountable for abuses without prior authorization from the president.

A culture of impunity in law enforcement leaves civilians in Haiti with little protection from the illegitimate use of force, and police themselves are subject to lethal attacks by heavily armed criminal groups.

Criminal groups fight one another for territory and prey on residents in areas under their control, earning revenue from kidnappings, extortion, and other illegal activities. In July, the G9 an Fanmi e Alye fought other groups for control of Nan Brooklyn, an area that sits within the Cité Soleil section of Port-au-Prince. In late July, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that some 300 people were killed in the fight for control of that area. In its October report, the BINUH documented 1,377 deaths, injuries, and disappearances between June and September that it blamed on gang activity. It also reported that gang members subjected women, girls, and LGBT+ people to sexual violence; some victims were mutilated or murdered by their assailants.

Police are regularly accused of abusing suspects and detainees. Police have also been known to use extreme force to repress protests. Police are rarely held accountable for their use of physical force.

Prison conditions are especially poor. Facilities are overcrowded and understaffed. Prisons also ran out of food during 2022, with eight inmates held in a Les Cayes prison dying due to conditions or of starvation by June. Authorities released prisoners in Cap-Haïtien and Les Cayes in July due to a lack of food. In October, Health through Walls, an NGO that provides medical support for prisoners, reported that at least 21 people held in the National Penitentiary had died earlier that month as cholera spread through the prison system.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Discrimination against women, the LGBT+ community, and people with disabilities is pervasive. Among other problems, women face bias in employment and disparities in access to financial services.

A reformed yet highly contested penal code was published in 2020 by executive decree and was set to take effect in June 2022, but its implementation was delayed to 2024. It prohibits gender-based violence, sexual harassment, and discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, which occur regularly in practice. Conservative cultural and religious groups objected to the new code in part because it lowered the age of consent.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16 (−1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

The government generally does not restrict travel or place limits on the ability to change one's place of employment or education. However, insecurity has prevented free movement, particularly in Port-au-Prince, as roads are frequently blockaded by criminal groups, police, or protesters, and many residents avoid unnecessary travel due to widespread gang violence. Movement was further restricted by roadblocks, protests, and the occupation of the country's main fuel terminal after the government announced a fuel-subsidy reduction in September 2022.

The International Organization of Migration counted 113,000 internally displaced people as of August 2022, most of whom fled the capital due to gang violence. Many displaced Haitians live in especially poor conditions.

Although the legal framework protects property rights and private business activity, it is difficult in practice to register property, enforce contracts, and obtain credit. Poor record-keeping and corruption contribute to inconsistent enforcement of property rights.

Business owners faced more intensive extortion efforts on the part of criminal gangs in 2022. Criminal gangs are also known to demand bribes or other support from officials. NGOs, meanwhile, have had to negotiate with criminal groups for access to territory; criminal groups have additionally pressured NGOs into providing financial assistance or hiring their members.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because criminal actors interfere with business activity in areas they control, in part by demanding payment from business owners and other actors.

Basic freedoms related to marriage, divorce, and custody are generally respected. However, there are no laws specifically addressing domestic violence, which is a widespread problem. Both domestic violence and rape are underreported and rarely result in successful prosecutions, with justice officials often favoring reconciliation or other forms of settlement. Spousal rape is not recognized as a criminal offense. Sexual violence has also become more common due to gang activity. According to an August 2022 report, the RNDDH learned of at least 52 women and girls who were raped as gangs fought for control of Nan Brooklyn in July. In its October report, the BINUH said that gangs were engaging in sexual violence as a means of subjugation.

The reformed penal code that was set to take effect in June 2022 would decriminalize abortion in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy, in cases of rape or incest, or when there is a threat to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman. Abortion was prohibited entirely under existing law. The reformed code would also lower the age of consent to 15. The government postponed the implementation of the code in June, largely due to negative public reaction but also due to a lack of follow-through on its own part.

Socioeconomic mobility is obstructed by entrenched poverty and inequality. Legal protections against exploitative working conditions in formal employment are weakly enforced, and most workers are informally employed. After workers protested for better pay, the government introduced new minimum wages for three wage classes in February 2022.

As many as 300,000 children work as domestic servants, often without pay or access to education; they are especially vulnerable to physical or sexual abuse. Other forms of child labor are common.

To escape dire social and economic conditions at home, many Haitians have risked human trafficking and dangerous land and sea journeys to reach countries including The Bahamas, Brazil, Chile, the Dominican Republic, Mexico, and the United States.

Honduras

Population: 9,600,000
Capital: Tegucigalpa
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Institutional weakness, corruption, violence, and impunity undermine the overall stability of Honduras. Journalists, political activists, and women are often the victims of violence, and perpetrators are rarely brought to justice. Honduras holds regular elections; while the 2017 presidential poll prompted concerns over irregularities, the 2021 elections—which ushered in Honduras's first female president—were more transparent. However, that year's executive and legislative elections were marred by unprecedented violence.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In January, Xiomara Castro of the Liberty and Refoundation Party (Libre) was inaugurated as president, ending National Party (PN) control of that office and becoming the country's first female chief executive.
- Former president Juan Orlando Hernández, Castro's immediate predecessor, was arrested by police in Honduras in February, with the Castro administration accusing him of collaborating with drug cartels. Hernández was extradited to the United States in April.
- In July, the National Congress passed a law reforming the Nominating Board, which names nominees to fill Supreme Court seats. The law establishes guidelines for board members and limits some of the discretionary power they enjoy. Critics warned the new law would still allow political influence in the selection process.
- In December, the government enacted a state of exception, allowing authorities to restrict the freedom of assembly and movement in response to gang-related violence. The state of exception affected parts of Tegucigalpa and San Pedro Sula and remained in effect at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 22 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 8 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is the chief of state and head of government and is elected by popular vote to four-year terms. The leading candidate need only win a plurality; there is no runoff.

Following severe irregularities in the 2017 presidential election, the National Congress created two new electoral bodies in 2019: the Electoral Court of Justice (TJE) and National Electoral Council (CNE).

In November 2021—and in the first presidential contest administered by the TJE and CNE—Xiomara Castro of Libre was elected with 51.1 percent of the vote, ending 12 years of PN executive control. Castro defeated then Tegucigalpa mayor Nasry Asfura of the PN. European Union election monitors lauded that year's electoral reforms, which allowed for increased transparency and confidence, but noted that severe problems remained. Castro, the nation's first female chief executive, was elected amid high voter turnout and was inaugurated in January 2022.

Members of the 128-seat unicameral National Congress are elected for four-year terms using proportional representation by department. All seats are renewed in each election.

In the November 2021 polls, Libre won 50 seats, the PN won 44, the Liberal Party (PL) won 22, and the Savior Party of Honduras won 10. The Christian Democratic Party and the Anticorruption Party (PAC) each won 1. The legislative and municipal contests were competitive but were also marred by severe political violence; at least 68 candidates were murdered in the run-up to the elections. Voter intimidation and the abuse of state resources were also reported.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE) came under heavy criticism for its administration of the 2017 presidential poll, which prompted protests and allegations of TSE incompetence and pro-PN bias. In 2019, the National Congress created the TJE and the CNE to replace it.

In May 2021, legislators passed a new electoral law, incorporating several reforms to improve public trust and encourage stability and transparency in the electoral process; reforms included voter-registration management improvements, the modernization of the National Identification Document program, and the involvement of multiple parties in the management of electoral institutions. As a result, the November 2021 elections enjoyed a heightened level of legitimacy and did not suffer the irregularities seen in 2017.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16

Political parties are free to operate. While power has mostly been concentrated in the hands of the PL and the PN since democratization in the early 1980s, party politics in Honduras shifted in the 2010s. In 2013, Libre and the PAC participated in elections for the first time. Six parties won National Congress seats in 2021.

Although opposition parties were affected by acts of political violence and electoral irregularities favoring the PN, they remained competitive. In 2021, the PN was ousted from the presidency for the first time in 12 years by Xiomara Castro of Libre. The PN also lost its congressional majority and mayoral races in Tegucigalpa and San Pedro Sula that year.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Elites have traditionally exerted significant influence over political parties, limiting people's political choices. The military remains politically powerful. Gangs, many with ties to drug trafficking, also sway decisions at the subnational level.

Political violence is widespread and includes harassment, threats, and intimidation directed at candidates, politicians, and voters, especially women. In 2021, the University Institute for Democracy, Peace, and Security reported more than 30 deaths related to political and electoral violence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Adult citizens have the right to vote. Ethnic minorities, the LGBT+ population, and women, however, remain politically underrepresented, though political parties must abide by a 40 percent gender quota for their slates of congressional candidates. Some 27.3 percent of the National Congress's seats are held by women, the highest figure seen in the 21st century.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12 (+1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Power was consolidated in the executive branch under measures adopted since 2014. The military, which has traditionally maintained substantial autonomy from civilian oversight, has played an increasing role in both internal security and programs unrelated to security.

There are growing concerns over the influence that President Castro's husband, former president José Manuel Zelaya Rosales (2006–09), and other members of the Zelaya family have over political affairs.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption was rampant under the PN. The Mission to Support the Fight against Corruption and Impunity in Honduras, established in 2016, was shut down in 2020 despite public support for that body.

President Castro's immediate predecessor, Juan Orlando Hernández, was directly implicated in corruption in 2019 when US prosecutors identified him and former president Porfirio Lobo as coconspirators in a drug-smuggling operation run by Hernández's brother. Former president Hernández was arrested by police in Honduras in February 2022—with the Castro administration accusing him of collaborating with drug cartels—and was extradited to face drug-trafficking and arms charges in the United States in April.

President Castro has a mixed anticorruption record. In February 2022, the National Congress passed a law providing amnesty to officials serving during the Zelaya administration, including those targeted or prosecuted for opposing the 2009 coup d'état against Zelaya. Critics objected to the law's breadth, saying it would pardon those engaged in corruption. Ángel Edmundo Orellana Mercado, who served as transparency minister in 2022, called the law an "impunity pact." In July, the US State Department released a list of corrupt and undemocratic actors in Guatemala, Honduras, and El Salvador; two Libre congresspeople and an advisor to President Castro were included. Since the Castro administration took office, Libre activists have also targeted public-sector employees and demanded employment based on their party affiliation.

However, the Castro administration facilitated the extradition of former president Hernández. In December, the government signed a memorandum of understanding with the United Nations to create a UN-backed International Mission against Impunity in Honduras.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4 (+1)

Government operations are generally opaque. Journalists and interest groups have difficulty obtaining information from the government. A secrecy law passed in 2014 allowed authorities to withhold information on security and national defense for up to 25 years. Civil society representatives criticized the 2020 creation of a Ministry of Transparency as an effort to undermine the efficacy of existing transparency mechanisms.

The Castro administration has taken some steps to foster greater openness and transparency. The Hernández-era secrecy law, which was perceived as a vehicle for official corruption, was repealed in March 2022. In April, legislators repealed a law that created Areas of Employment and Economic Development (ZEDEs), which were meant to attract investment but prompted fears that they would facilitate corrupt activities. Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that some ZEDEs, which allowed private firms operating there considerable autonomy, were still active as of October. In July, legislators passed a law to improve transparency in the nomination of Supreme Court justices, although it was criticized for favoring the interests of political parties, particularly Libre.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because legislators repealed a secrecy law that allowed authorities to withhold information on security-related matters and was viewed as a vehicle for official corruption.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 26 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Authorities systematically violate the constitution's press freedom guarantees. Reporters and outlets covering sensitive topics or who are perceived as critical of the authorities risk assaults, threats, blocked transmissions, and harassment.

In May 2022, the National Commissioner for Human Rights in Honduras (CONADEH) reported that 92 individuals linked to journalism were killed since 2001. Five journalists were killed in 2022 through October according to the Committee for Free Expression (C-Libre). A special prosecutor's office for the protection of journalists and other civil society workers has limited resources and few prosecutors, undermining its mission.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is generally respected in Honduras.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Criminal groups undermine academic freedom, as they control all or parts of schools in some areas and subject staff to extortion schemes. Authorities sometimes move to suppress student demonstrations by arresting participants and dispersing the events, and violent clashes between police and student protesters sometimes occur.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Under the 2011 Special Law on Interception of Private Communications, the government can intercept online and telephone messages. Violence, threats, and intimidation by state and nonstate actors curtail open and free private discussion among the general population.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected. In the past, PN governments used force to disperse rallies. Amnesty International reported that authorities regularly employed tear gas and live ammunition during protests or government reprisals.

Protests were held in 2022 but the right to assemble was restricted in parts of Tegucigalpa and San Pedro Sula in December, when the Castro administration enacted a state of exception in response to gang-related violence. Freedom of assembly and free movement were restricted in affected areas. Those measures remained in force at year's end.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and their staff, especially in the human rights and environmental fields, often faced significant threats, including harassment, surveillance, smear campaigns aimed at undermining their work, and violence under PN governments. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights documented the murders of 10 human rights defenders in 2021. Activists from the Garifuna community have been especially targeted with violence. While the Castro administration committed to implementing a policy to protect human rights activists, they are still threatened; in November 2022, the Committee of Relatives of the Detained and Disappeared in Honduras (COFADEH) criticized local PN officeholders for threatening land and environmental campaigners.

LGBT+ campaigners also face violence in Honduras. In January 2022, authorities arrested a member of the MS-13 criminal gang for murdering transgender activist Thalía Rodríguez, though the suspect was later released for lack of evidence.

In 2018, seven suspects were convicted for the prominent 2016 killing of environmental and Indigenous-rights activist Berta Cáceres; they received multidecade sentences in 2019. In 2021, Roberto David Castillo, former president of the Energy Developments power company, was convicted of murder for his role in planning Cáceres's assassination. In June 2022, Castillo received a 22-and-a-half-year prison sentence.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Labor unions are well organized and can strike. In the past, labor actions have resulted in clashes with security forces. The government does not always honor formal agreements entered with public-sector unions. Union leaders and labor activists in public and private sectors have faced harassment, dismissal, and violence for their activities. The change in government temporarily decreased tensions with unions since many have ties with the ruling Libre.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Political and business elites exert excessive influence over the judiciary, including the Supreme Court. Judicial appointments are made with little transparency, judges have been removed from their posts for political motivations, and several lawyers have been killed in recent years.

In 2021, legislators passed reforms limiting the public prosecutor's access to financial information in cases of corruption, curtailing the ability of the office to operate effectively. In July 2022, legislators passed a law regarding the Nominating Board for the Supreme Court; some of its provisions established new guidelines for board members and limited some of the discretionary power they enjoy. Critics of the law warned that it still allowed for political influence in judicial selection. In October, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) called on the government to ensure a transparent selection process. The board, which was sworn in in September, is due to submit a list of Supreme Court candidates to legislators in January 2023.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The lack of due process is a serious issue in Honduras. The judiciary and law enforcement agencies are often compromised and underfunded. As such, they are corrupt, targets of influence peddling and undue influence, and often engage in criminal activities.

PN governments utilized the armed forces to combat crime and violence. Arbitrary arrests and detentions were common, as was lengthy pretrial detention. Many people remained in pretrial detention in 2022.

The Castro administration has taken some steps to address due process and law enforcement problems. Ramón Sabillón, a former national police chief who was dismissed by former president Hernández and spent years in exile after arresting drug-trafficking suspects, was named security minister in January 2022. In August, the administration transferred control of prisons from the military to the national police for a one-year period. However, the government's announcement of a "war against extortion" in November and the resulting state of exception in December led to a suspension of constitutionally protected rights and raised due process concerns.

The homicide rate has declined in recent years, but violent crime and gang violence remain serious problems and have prompted large-scale internal displacement and migration. In response to widespread violence, the government of Juan Orlando Hernández empowered the Military Police of Public Order and other security forces to combat security threats, and that policy has continued under President Castro. However, these units often employ excessive force when conducting operations.

In 2022, authorities reported a 12.7 percent drop in homicides compared to 2021, but Honduras remained the most dangerous country in Central America based on that figure. Prisons remain overcrowded and underequipped, and prison violence remains rampant due primarily to gang activity.

Violence and discrimination against LGBT+ people and Indigenous and Garifuna populations persist at high levels. The Cattrachas Lesbian Response Network, a local NGO, recorded 194 murders and 3 disappearances of LGBT+ people between 2017 and 2022. The same NGO found only 22 percent of such murders committed between 2009 and 2022 have been prosecuted.

In 2021, the IACHR ruled that the government was responsible for failing to prevent, investigate, and prosecute the 2009 murder of Vicky Hernández, a transgender woman. In May 2022, President Castro publicly accepted the government's responsibility for Hernández's death. The IACHR ruling also mandated that the government must allow transgender people to change their gender identity on personal documents and in public records. The administration committed to complying with this requirement but had not done so as of October.

Lands inhabited by Indigenous and Afro-Honduran people are particularly vulnerable to expropriation for development projects without adequate prior consultation. Communities that contest such projects are unable to effectively assert their rights. In 2021, the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention called on the government to release eight human rights activists known as the Guapinol defenders, who had been detained for opposing a mine in a protected national park. Two were acquitted and released in early February 2022, while the Supreme Court ordered the release of the remaining six later that month.

In August 2022, the CONADEH reported that over 100 people experienced or were at risk of forced displacement based on complaints it addressed between 2016 and the first half of 2022.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Ongoing violence and impunity have reduced personal autonomy and freedom of movement in Honduras. Those living in gang-controlled territories face extortion, and dangerous conditions limit free movement and options for education and employment. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees calculated that over 247,000 people were internally displaced at the end of 2021, while 23,100 Hondurans requested asylum in Mexico in the first nine months of 2022.

The December 2022 state of exception curtailed constitutional rights, allowing authorities to restrict movement in parts of Tegucigalpa and San Pedro Sula.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Corruption, crime, and gang activity inhibit the ability to conduct business activities freely and dissuade entrepreneurs from establishing new businesses. Taxi and bus drivers are notable targets of gangs.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Same-sex marriage remains illegal in Honduras, despite ongoing calls for reform from LGBT+ activists. A 2019 law banned same-sex couples from adopting children despite the objection of activists, who called the bill excessive and discriminatory.

Abortion is illegal in Honduras, including in cases of rape or incest, with criminal sanctions including imprisonment for those accused of terminating their pregnancies. Emergency contraception is also illegal.

Domestic violence remains widespread and largely goes unpunished. Honduras has one of the world's highest femicide rates, and these murders are rarely investigated. According to the Center for Women's Rights, a local NGO, 297 women died by femicide in 2022.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Lack of socioeconomic opportunities combined with high levels of crime and violence limit social mobility for most Hondurans and exacerbate income inequality. Human trafficking remains a significant issue. Honduras serves as a source country for women and children forced into prostitution. Adults and children are also vulnerable to forced labor in agriculture, mining, and other sectors, and as domestic servants.

Hungary

Population: 9,700,000
Capital: Budapest
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Since taking power in the 2010 elections, Prime Minister Viktor Orbán's Alliance of Young Democrats–Hungarian Civic Union (Fidesz) party pushed through constitutional and legal changes that have allowed it to consolidate control over the country's independent institutions, including the judiciary. The Fidesz government has since passed antimigrant and anti-LGBT+ policies, as well as laws that hamper the operations of opposition groups, journalists, universities, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that are critical of the ruling party or whose perspectives Fidesz otherwise finds unfavorable.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- The coalition of Fidesz and the Christian Democratic People's Party (KDNP) won the April parliamentary elections with 54.13 percent of the vote, securing a fourth consecutive term and a two-thirds parliamentary majority with 135 seats. Election observer missions noted the polls were severely marred by misuse of government resources, an unlevel playing field for opposition parties, and extensive electoral reforms that favored the ruling party.
- In January, teachers' unions organized strikes across the country demanding higher salaries and lightened workloads. The government in February responded by curtailing the right to strike through COVID-19-related emergency powers. The restrictions, entrenched into ordinary legislation in May, made the right to strike in schools only nominal.
- In May, the government amended the law that defines the necessary conditions to declare a state of emergency or danger to include "armed conflict, war, or humanitarian catastrophe" in a neighboring country. Authorities subsequently declared a state of danger in November, referencing the Russia-Ukraine war, extending the executive's emergency powers.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 24 / 40 (−2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12 (−2)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4 (−1)

The National Assembly elects both the president and the prime minister, meaning the democratic legitimacy of these votes rests largely on the fairness of parliamentary elections. The president's duties are mainly ceremonial, but they may influence appointments and return legislation for further consideration before signing it into law. The president is limited to a maximum of two terms.

The April 2022 parliamentary elections were deemed severely flawed by observer missions, which noted that the rules were administered to advantage the Fidesz-KDNP ruling coalition. Fidesz elected Katalin Novák, a former minister and parliamentarian, as the first woman to be president of Hungary.

The prime minister holds most executive power. Viktor Orbán has been prime minister since 2010, winning reelection for a third time in the flawed 2022 elections.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because parliamentary elections were administered under rules that disproportionately advantaged the ruling party, negatively affecting the freeness and fairness of the election of the prime minister and president.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4 (−1)

Voters elect representatives every four years to a 199-seat, unicameral National Assembly under a mixed system of proportional and direct representation (106 from single-member districts and 93 from compensatory party lists). The Fidesz-KDNP coalition won the April 2022 parliamentary elections with 54.13 percent of the vote, securing a fourth consecutive term and a two-thirds majority with 135 seats. The coalition of opposition parties, United for Hungary, took 57 seats, and the far-right Our Homeland (Mi Hazánk) won 6 seats.

An election observation mission performed by the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR) found that the elections were well organized and professionally managed, but they failed to provide a level playing field and equality of opportunities among candidates. Significant media bias towards ruling parties and the misuse of state resources hindered voters' ability to make informed choices. Public media allowed only five minutes for the opposition coalition, formed by six parties, to present its program. The OSCE/ODIHR report emphasized the lack of effective legal remedy against irregularities and possible electoral fraud, as electoral authorities ruled mostly in favor of the Fidesz-KDNP, and noted several legal changes passed in recent years that may have impacted the election's outcome. For example, November 2021 electoral reforms enabled voters to register in districts they do not live, paving the way for possible voter tourism. Electoral authorities denied investigation into partially burned ballots found in Romania by referring to their lack of extraterritorial jurisdiction.

Human Rights Watch (HRW) found that the government misused personal data in several ways to disseminate Fidesz campaign messages. Warning of foreign intervention, the government also invited government-friendly election observers to legitimize the polls. Civil society organizations (CSOs) documented a series of attempts at electoral fraud, and independent media revealed evidence that postal ballots in Romania and Serbia were potentially tampered with by Fidesz allies.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to the disproportionate advantages the ruling party received, both in line with and against electoral rules, during parliamentary elections.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The electoral framework that was established by the Fidesz-KDNP majority has been amended regularly based on the political interest of the ruling coalition, and since 2010 Fidesz has redrawn constituency boundaries in its favor.

Electoral authorities are not independent. Members of the National Election Commission (NVB) are nominated by the president and confirmed to nine-year terms by the parliament. There is no formal parliamentary debate or public consultation process to inform the selection of NVB members, and observers have raised concerns about the body's impartiality. However, because of the OSCE mission and more than 27,000 volunteers mobilized by civil society organizations, there was likely no fraud on election day in April 2022.

In recent years, Orbán's government has been largely successful in superseding impartiality requirements. Voters living outside Hungary are not guaranteed the ability to vote, and national minority voters have long faced systemic challenges in exercising their right to vote.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16

Political parties can organize legally, but they face some practical impediments to garnering popular support. Opposition parties are disadvantaged by the politicized distortion of the advertising market, including the market for the country's many billboards.

Individual politicians face smear campaigns in progovernment media outlets, and the government has taken steps to split the opposition vote in recent elections. Authorities have also interfered with opposition figures' peaceful political activities.

Parliament further amended the electoral framework in 2020, requiring political parties field candidates in 71 (instead of 27) single-member constituencies on a single list, forcing opposition parties to combine and field one consolidated list of candidates in the 2022 general elections. The government also maintains effective control of the State Audit Office (ÁSZ), which monitors campaign activities and party spending. In recent years, the ÁSZ has imposed sanctions on opposition parties for financial irregularities, while condoning or overlooking problematic spending of state subsidies by Fidesz.

Fidesz has dominated the political landscape since the 2010 election. Opposition parties contended with even more obstacles and restrictions that detracted from their ability to gain power in the 2022 elections, despite banding together to present one unified slate of candidates. These included unequal access to media, smear campaigns, politicized audits, and a campaign environment skewed by the ruling coalition's mobilization of state resources.

The OSCE found a pervasive overlap between ruling coalition resources and government resources. The government used email addresses collected for pandemic-related communications to disseminate campaign messages and distorted information about the opposition's position regarding the Russia-Ukraine war. Third-party spending, especially in social media, also strongly benefitted the ruling coalition. Fidesz-KDNP candidates were not willing to engage in televised debates with their opponents.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Individuals are largely able to participate in public affairs without encountering undue influence over their political choices. However, Fidesz has increasingly harnessed its members' political and economic power to sideline opposition groups and prevent them from presenting a meaningful challenge to its dominant position. The 2022 OSCE observation mission stressed recurring concerns of illegal practices that Roma are typically affected by: vote buying, pressure from mayors in relation to public employment programs, and stigmatizing campaign rhetoric.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women are underrepresented in political life, and the share of women in the parliament remains low. Only 26 of 199 National Assembly members and 1 out of 14 cabinet ministers are women following the 2022 elections. Ruling party ministers and progovernment media occasionally make derogatory and sexist remarks toward women parliamentarians.

Hungary's constitution guarantees the right of ethnic minority populations to form self-governing bodies, and all 13 recognized minorities have done so. Minorities can also register to vote for special minority lists—with a preferential vote threshold—in parliamentary elections. Minorities without a parliamentary mandate can send a "national minority advocate" to the parliament without voting rights. Only 1 of the 13 recognized minorities managed to elect a representative with voting rights to the National Assembly in 2022.

Roma have long been underrepresented in politics and government and have been the target of derogatory rhetoric from Fidesz members in recent years.

Though individual opposition politicians have openly supported equal rights for LGBT+ people, and the party Momentum has done so explicitly, LGBT+ people's interests are not successfully represented in the parliament. The April 2022 polls included a referendum on a "child protection" law, a euphemism for provisions of another recently passed anti-LGBT+ law that bans any portrayal of LGBT+ people in materials meant for children. The referendum was made invalid after some 1.7 million voters cast invalid ballots in protest.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The governing coalition is effectively able to draft and implement laws and policies at will. Fidesz continues to dominate governance through a parliamentary supermajority acquired by means of elections that were not fully competitive. Prime Minister Orbán, the party's leader, exerts considerable influence over the legislature. The ability of the opposition to check government activities remains limited.

Lawmakers have had their behavior in the National Assembly restricted in several ways. The speaker of the National Assembly has disciplined and fined opposition lawmakers for occupying the lectern and bringing signs onto the floor.

In March 2020, in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, the government declared a "state of danger" and passed the widely denounced Authorization Act, conferring sweeping emergency powers to the executive, which it has used without accountability to restrict civil liberties unrelated to public health or safety. This COVID-19 emergency legal regime enabled the government to rule by decree and was prolonged several times until November 2022, when the government declared another state of danger related to the Russia-Ukraine war. Before this, in May, the government had amended the law defining the necessary conditions for a state of danger to include "armed conflict, war, or humanitarian catastrophe" in a neighboring country.

Corruption remains a problem in Hungary, and instances of high-level government corruption have not been properly investigated. Fidesz has established control over auditing and investigative bodies, including the ÁSZ.

Prosecutors have also been reluctant to investigate long-standing allegations of the misuse of public development funds disbursed by the European Union (EU), despite the severity of the problem. In December 2022, the European Commission withdrew €22 billion under the EU Cohesion Fund from Hungary in response to repeated violations of EU law, the Hungarian courts' lack of judicial independence, corruption allegations regarding the use of EU funds, and more.

Throughout 2022, the government adopted a series of anticorruption measures for the proper handling of EU funds. In November, a new Integrity Authority was established, though with limited power to conduct investigations and suspend ongoing public procurement processes. According to Hungarian and international watchdog organizations, the measures were broadly insufficient.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Hungary's Freedom of Information Act contains numerous exemptions, permits agencies to charge fees for the release of information, and is inconsistently enforced. In many cases, information is only made available because of litigation. In November 2020, the parliament narrowed the legal definition of what constitutes public funds, hampering oversight of large amounts of public money.

Major legislation is frequently rushed through the parliament, leaving citizens and interest groups little time to provide feedback or criticism. Important proposals are hidden in long omnibus bills, and the government tends to submit substantial bills overnight. In October 2022, the government amended public consultation rules to strengthen public participation in lawmaking, which Hungarian NGOs denounced the law as superficial. Journalists have been curtailed from performing their duties while covering parliamentary events; the speaker prohibited audio and video recording in corridors surrounding the plenary chamber, entrances, and on-site cafeterias in October 2019.

When emergency laws were introduced in April 2020 due to the COVID-19 pandemic, the government extended the deadline for fulfilling freedom of information requests until November 2022. Critics have since complained that authorities have abused this deadline exemption.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 42 / 60 (−1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of the press, but Fidesz has undermined this guarantee. While privately owned opposition-aligned media outlets exist, national, regional, and local media are increasingly dominated by progovernment outlets, which are frequently used to smear political opponents and highlight false accusations. Government advertising and sponsorships favor progovernment outlets, leaving independent and critical news sources in a financially precarious position. Public service media controlled by the government has disseminated disinformation and Russian war propaganda since the February 2022 invasion of Ukraine.

The Fidesz governing coalition and their allies have worked to close or acquire critical media outlets. The 2016 closure of Hungary's largest independent daily, Népszabadság, represented a particularly serious blow to media diversity. In 2018, around 470 progovernment media outlets were merged under the Central European Press and Media Foundation (KESMA). Index, the country's largest independent news outlet, was also taken over by progovernment forces in 2020. That year, the Media Council also revoked the broadcasting license of Klubrádió, the country's largest independent radio station, forcing it off the air in February 2021.

Changes to the "scaremongering" law in 2020, ostensibly to fight false or distorted information about the COVID-19 pandemic, ultimately challenged journalists' ability to secure reliable information, as many individuals, especially health care workers, feared retaliation if they provided information publicly.

In July 2021, an investigation by a team of international journalists, including the Hungarian outlet Direkt36, revealed that independent journalists were surveilled by the Hungarian authorities using the Israeli-made spyware, Pegasus.

Since 2010, Fidesz has gradually taken over artistic and cultural institutions and film and publishing industries and redirected funding for projects and artworks openly promoting nationalistic and Christian values.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees religious freedom and provides for the separation of church and state, though these guarantees were weakened in the 2011 version of the constitution, the preamble of which makes direct references to Christianity. Constitutional amendments enacted in 2018 and 2020 reinforced those references, obliging all state organs to protect "Christian culture" and guaranteeing children's right to education based on Christian values.

The government has led xenophobic campaigns in recent years, which has anti-Muslim sentiment.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

The Fidesz-led government has maintained its efforts to bring schools and universities under close supervision. A gradual overhaul of the public education system raised concerns about excessive government influence on school curriculums, and Parliament has restructured institutions and their finances to increase government-appointed chancellors' powers. Authorities have increasingly threatened the academic autonomy of well-established institutions, pulling support, interfering in their affairs, and landing progovernment supporters in leading positions. The government has revoked accreditation from all gender studies programs.

Progovernment media outlets commonly target activists, academics, programs, and institutions, often by calling them "Soros agents," referring to Hungarian-born financier and philanthropist George Soros. Fidesz has targeted the Central European University (CEU), a graduate school founded by Soros, by changing the requirements for foreign universities to operate in Hungary. The government also targeted the Hungarian Academy of Sciences (MTA), stripping the 200-year-old academy of its network of research institutions in 2019 and handing it over to a new governing body.

A July 2022 ÁSZ report on "pink education" made the unfounded claim that the overrepresentation of women in higher education might cause demographic challenges and economic harm.

While freedom of expression is constitutionally protected, ongoing efforts to sideline voices and perspectives that authorities find unfavorable, including many found at the MTA, CEU, NGOs, and media outlets, have discouraged open criticism of the government and other politically sensitive speech.

In July 2021, an investigation by a team of international journalists revealed that journalists, businessmen, lawyers, and politicians were the targets of secret surveillance conducted with the Israeli-made spyware, Pegasus. A Fidesz parliamentarian in November of that year admitted the purchase of the spyware but denied allegations that it had been used on Hungarians. In January and June 2022, Hungarian authorities closed investigations into the allegations, claiming they had no evidence that any law had been broken in purchasing Pegasus. Hungary has failed to fully execute a 2016 European Court of Human Rights ruling to incorporate effective institutional guarantees against improper surveillance, which was reiterated by the court in another case in September 2022.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12 (−1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly, and the government generally respects this right in practice. Fidesz's electoral victory in 2018 prompted large crowds to turn out for peaceful antigovernment demonstrations.

The government continued for months into 2021 the total ban on demonstrations introduced in 2020 to prevent the spread of COVID-19, despite permitting other forms of public events and gatherings. In July 2022, masses rallied on streets across the country to protest against the overhaul of a small-business tax scheme.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

NGOs whose activities conflict with government priorities have come under continued pressure since Fidesz took power. Fidesz has instituted burdensome registration and reporting requirements for NGOs, and police have illegally raided NGO offices. Organizations assisting asylum seekers have also been subject to Hungary's "Stop Soros" laws, which heavily restricted the right to asylum and criminalized activities supporting asylum seekers. The CJEU ruled in November 2021 that the "Stop Soros" laws violated EU law.

The government continues to stigmatize NGOs as "foreign agents" or "Soros agents," and frequently scapegoats them for developments unfavorable to the government or deemed unpopular in the eyes of the public. Civil activists won a lawsuit in September 2022 against progovernment weekly Figyelő for being listed in 2018 as Soros "mercenaries."

In 2020, the CJEU ruled that the 2017 Act on the Transparency of Organizations was incompatible with EU jurisprudence. In May 2021, in response to this judgment, a new law on the transparency of NGOs was adopted, requiring civil society organizations to submit to yearly financial audits by the ÁSZ should they report donations of more than €55,000. ÁSZ started in May 2022 extensive audits of NGOs labeled "organizations capable of influencing public life."

Hungarian NGOs encouraging individuals to invalidate their ballots in the April 2022 anti-LGBT+ referendum, thus invalidating the vote, were fined in by electoral authorities. Some, but not all, of the fines were remedied by courts.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4 (−1)

Workers' rights to form associations and bargain collectively are generally recognized, but the 2012 Labor Code weakened the position of trade unions by curtailing their rights. There are significant limitations on what can be considered a lawful strike, and the government has successfully blocked efforts to organize strikes in recent years. Union membership is low, trade unions are present in less than 25 percent of workplaces, and only 7 percent of workers belong to one.

In January 2022, teachers' unions organized strikes across the country demanding higher salaries and lightened workloads in public education. The government in February responded by seriously curtailing the right to strike through COVID-19-related emergency powers. The restrictions, entrenched into ordinary legislation in May, made the right to strike in schools only nominal. Striking teachers were threatened with sanctions by their employers, and many of them were dismissed.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the government curtailed the right to strike in response to strike actions by teachers' unions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judicial independence remains a matter of concern. Eleven judges appointed to the Constitutional Court were named by the Fidesz government, and in 2016 a small opposition party was included in the nomination process for four other judges. Rulings in recent years on politically sensitive cases have favored government interests. High-ranking government officials and progovernment media berate judgments that are detrimental to Fidesz's interests and regularly launch attacks against judges who publicly speak up against measures threatening judicial independence.

The government has also interfered with the administration of the judicial branch in recent years. Significant powers are vested in the president of National Judicial Office (NJO), while the powers of the judicial self-governing body, the National Judicial Council (NJC), which supervises the president of the NJO, are relatively weak. Tünde Handó, former NJO president, was appointed to the Constitutional Court in 2020 and was replaced by György Barna Senyei, another Fidesz ally.

In 2019, the government passed an omnibus bill that restricted judicial interpretation of existing case law and allowed members of the Constitutional Court to assume a seat on the Supreme Court without nomination. In October 2020, Constitutional Court justice Zsolt András Varga, who had written several decisions favorable to the government, was elected president of the Supreme Court, despite the NJC's overwhelming opposition. In addition, administrative authorities were also given the chance to challenge unfavorable rulings directly before the Constitutional Court. In July 2022, the NJC discovered several irregularities in appointments made by the Supreme Court chief justice.

In July 2021, a junior judge who had been removed from her position challenged her dismissal through the European Commission, claiming it was politically motivated; she had challenged Hungarian asylum legislation before the CJEU. In November 2021, the CJEU ruled that exposing judges to disciplinary proceedings for referring questions to the EU court is incompatible with EU law and judicial independence.

Leaked evidence from a 2022 corruption scandal suggests that high-ranking justice officials have interfered in criminal investigations.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are enshrined in the constitution and are generally respected. Litigation costs are relatively high, while access to legal aid is limited. There have been concerns about the quality of lawyers appointed for defendants who are unable or unwilling to retain legal counsel on their own.

Hungarian courts have shown some resistance to European judicial oversight on due process matters. In November 2021, the CJEU found that Hungary's Supreme Court had broken EU law when Prosecutor General Péter Polt in 2019 attempted to limit the oversight of the European Court of Justice (ECJ) over a domestic criminal proceeding, in which a lower-level judge sought the ECJ's opinion on its compliance with EU regulations.

In June 2021, the National Assembly passed a measure enabling defendants to claim a compensatory remedy for the excessive length of civil proceedings.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Inadequate medical care and poor sanitation in the country's prisons and detention centers remain problems. The coronavirus presented further challenges to the safety of prisoners and prison staff. In 2020, the government created new facilities that added significantly more space in prisons and detention centers, bringing prison capacities under 100 percent. However, the prison population has continuously risen due to penal populism and the "tough on crime" stance of the government.

Physical abuse by police is a problem, and there are systematic deficiencies in reporting, indicting, investigating, and sanctioning such conduct.

The rights of refugees and asylum seekers are routinely violated in Hungary, where frequent changes to asylum policy—including the uncontestable declaration, by law, of

Serbia as a safe third country—and the construction of barriers along the country's southern border made it nearly impossible for individuals to apply for asylum and receive protection. In the past, asylum seekers were frequently detained in poorly equipped transit zones, and few were recognized by Hungarian authorities as refugees. In 2020, the CJEU ruled that Hungarian asylum procedures were incompatible with EU law and placing asylum seekers in the transit zones constituted unlawful detention. The government subsequently closed the transit zones but passed legislation requiring asylum seekers to present their documentation at diplomatic missions in other countries.

Despite EU court rulings, the government has maintained its stance; it continues to train special police units with wide powers to remove migrants from the country. The government has failed to discontinue the practice of "pushbacks," or the removal of asylum seekers to Serbia, in breach of EU law and in violation of the 2020 CJEU ruling. Consequently, in January 2021, the EU border control agency Frontex suspended its operations in Hungary. While the number of pushbacks peaked in November 2022 at more than 138,000, Prime Minister Orbán encouraged "border hunters," newly inaugurated in September 2022, to commit mass human right violations, calling for the removal of all migrants from Hungary.

While the southern borders are completely shut down to asylum seekers, Hungary has opened its eastern borders for those fleeing Ukraine, reflecting its discriminatory migration policies. Hungary has provided temporary protection status for Ukrainian citizens and their family members fleeing the war; this protection, however, did not cover non-Ukrainians who had legally resided in Ukraine. Human rights NGOs and volunteer groups, not the government, were primarily those who provided aid in the form of accommodation, food, and information for those fleeing their home. While the government described their efforts as the largest ever humanitarian action by the government, only a small percentage of those who arrived in Hungary in 2022 applied for temporary protection.

Roma are Hungary's largest ethnic minority and face widespread discrimination, societal exclusion, violence, and poverty. Roma students continue to be illegally segregated or improperly placed in schools for children with mental disabilities. In early 2020, Prime Minister Orbán launched an anti-Roma campaign in response to a court awarding pecuniary damages to Roma pupils for school segregation in the town of Gyöngyöspata. That year, the National Assembly amended public education laws to prevent courts from awarding pecuniary damages for similar future claims.

Women in Hungary are subject to employment discrimination and tend to be underrepresented in high-level business positions.

The Fidesz government has been increasingly and openly discriminatory toward many groups, but particularly LGBT+ people. In 2020, the parliament voted to end the legal recognition of gender identity, passed a law that severely restricts same-sex couples' ability to adopt children, and declared that the legal parents of a child are a woman and a man. Senior Fidesz politicians have made homophobic statements in public, and the government uses anti-LGBT+ rhetoric extensively. A June 2021 law banned the discussion of gender and sexual diversity in schools, the media, advertising, and other public places. The legislation, which conflates pedophilia with homosexuality and expressions of gender identity, was challenged by a European Commission infringement procedure in July. Media and NGOs reported a rise in verbal and physical assaults against LGBT+ people since the 2021 law entered into force.

Antisemitism persists in Hungary, and the government's anti-Soros campaigns pander to individuals with those sentiments. In January 2021, the Equal Treatment Authority—one of Hungary's most effective institutional mechanisms to fight discrimination—was abolished. Its powers were transferred to the Commissioner for Fundamental Rights, whose independence and effectiveness is highly questionable.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on Hungarians' freedom of travel or their ability to change their place of residence or employment. Movement restrictions and curfews related to the COVID-19 pandemic were instituted based on epidemiological data.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Individuals have the right to own property and establish private businesses. However, the success of a business is somewhat dependent upon its owner's government connections. Businesspeople whose activities are not in line with the financial or political interest of the government are likely to face harassment and intimidation, and subject to increasing administrative pressure for a possible takeover. In August 2022, the minister of justice announced that the airline Ryanair was to be fined for unfair trade practices. The company's chief executive had publicly criticized the government's May 2022 small-business tax.

Changes in 2022 to the small-business tax scheme were adopted overnight without public consultation and negatively affected hundreds of thousands of entrepreneurs.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

The constitution defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman. LGBT+ Hungarians are allowed to pursue civil unions.

In 2020, the National Assembly ended the legal recognition of gender identity for transgender people. As a result of the Ninth Amendment of the Fundamental Law, the constitution now stipulates that "the mother is a woman, the father is a man," and "Hungary protects the right of children to self-identify in line with their birth sex." Furthermore, the law effectively limits the right to adoption only to married couples, excluding single people and non-married partners—among them same-sex couples—from this right.

Domestic violence and spousal rape are illegal, but the definition of rape hinges on the use of force or coercion, not on lack of consent. NGOs describe government responses to violence against women as inadequate. In 2020, the parliament rejected the ratification of the Istanbul Convention over what parliamentarians considered to be the destructive nature of the convention's gender ideology and the document's preferential treatment for asylum seekers based on gender. While the government has opened victim support centers in recent years, there have been numerous media reports about domestic violence cases having fatal consequences.

Though the constitution defines life as beginning from conception, the statutory regime makes abortion broadly available. However, in September 2022, the government unexpectedly restricted access to abortion by ministerial degree, dubbed a "heartbeat law," requiring the presentation of the fetus's vital functions to the pregnant person before the termination of the pregnancy.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Hungary is a transit point, source, and to a lesser extent, destination for trafficked persons, including women trafficked for prostitution. Prevention, coordination efforts, and processes to identify and support victims remain inadequate, while trafficking investigations and enforcement of relevant laws are unreliable. In 2020, the government adopted a National Strategy against Human Trafficking for 2020–23, which included harsher sanctions for traffickers. The parliament also amended the relevant laws primarily to protect children against sexual exploitation.

A 2018 labor code amendment significantly raised the maximum hours of overtime employers are allowed to ask for per year.

Iceland

Population: 400,000
Capital: Reykjavík
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Iceland is a parliamentary democracy with a long history of upholding political rights and civil liberties. However, links between elected representatives and business interests remain a concern, as does the concentration of private media ownership.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

A record number of refugees—numbering nearly 4,000 people—reportedly arrived in Iceland during the year. The government sometimes struggled to provide services for new refugees due to the unprecedented number of arrivals.

In December, the Minister of Justice announced that police would be authorized to carry stun guns. The announcement came amid reports of a "slight increase" in violent crime during the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president serves as a largely ceremonial chief of state, is directly elected to a four-year term, and is not subject to term limits. President Guðni Thorlacius Jóhannesson was reelected in June 2020 with 92.2 percent of the vote.

The prime minister is the head of government. The leader of the ruling party or coalition usually becomes prime minister; the legitimacy of the prime minister rests primarily on the conduct of the parliamentary polls. The current prime minister, Katrín Jakobsdóttir of the Left-Green Movement (LGM), first took office in 2017. The governing coalition—composed of the Independence Party (IP), the LGM, and the Progressive Party—kept its majority following parliamentary elections in September 2021, with Jakobsdóttir retaining her leadership position.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 63-member unicameral Parliament is elected for four-year terms.

Parliamentary elections were held in September 2021, and saw the governing coalition keep its majority, with the IP winning 16 seats, the Progressive Party winning 13, and the LGM winning 8. After several weeks of negotiations, the parties agreed to renew their coalition.

The elections were generally considered free and fair, but were marked by procedural irregularities. In the country's northwest electoral district, extremely close results led to a recount the day after the election, resulting in five candidates—whose electoral victories had been announced earlier that day—losing their seats to other candidates from the same parties. The legality of the recount came into question after flaws in the district's vote counting process were discovered, including the officials' failure to seal the ballots following the initial count. Parliament confirmed the validity of the recount in November.

Municipal elections were held in May 2022 and saw a voter turnout of 63 percent nationwide.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The constitution, the election law of 2000, and related legislation establish a clear and detailed framework for conducting elections. Electoral laws are implemented impartially by a variety of national and regional authorities. However, the division of responsibilities between the relevant bodies is not always well defined.

A candidate who lost his parliamentary seat following the recount of the September 2021 parliamentary election results has submitted a complaint to the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) regarding alleged flaws in the counting process.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

Political parties form and operate freely, rising and falling according to political developments and the will of the public. Several new parties contested the 2021 parliamentary election, though no representatives from those parties were elected.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties can gain power through free elections. However, the IP has only rarely lost its status as the largest party in Parliament and has been included in all but one governing coalition since 1991.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

No military, foreign, or religious entities exert undemocratic influence over voters' choices. However, some politicians and parties are closely linked with businesses, which in turn exert significant political influence. In one example, former fisheries minister Kristján Þór Júlíusson was closely affiliated with Samherji, an Icelandic fishing company that was implicated in a scheme to bribe Namibian officials in 2019. In 2022, some high-profile politicians drew criticism for supporting a criminal investigation into four journalists related to their work reporting on the Samherji scandal.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

All adult Icelandic citizens may vote in local and national elections. Electoral law amendments enacted in January 2022 allow foreigners to vote in municipal elections if they have been residents for at least three years and removed the waiting period for citizens of Nordic countries residing in Iceland.

The interests of women and LGBT+ people are well represented in politics. Following the 2021 parliamentary election, women make up nearly 48 percent of Parliament.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

While Iceland maintains robust anticorruption laws, public officials and major companies have engaged in corrupt behavior. Some officials implicated in corrupt or unsavory behavior have continued to serve in government.

In 2018, the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) published a report urging the government to strengthen regulations on accepting third-party gifts and criticizing the inadequate enforcement of conflict-of-interest rules. New conflict-of-interest legislation for ministers, their advisers, and permanent secretaries entered into force in January 2021, as did a new law protecting whistleblowers. However, according to a GRECO report published in December 2022, the government has not sufficiently addressed the recommendations made in the 2018 report.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Iceland made changes to its Information Act in 2013 to strengthen existing legislation on transparency and freedom of information. However, the act has been criticized by press freedom advocates as having weak provisions. In the past, public officials have sought to conceal information that may be embarrassing or implicate them in wrongdoing.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of speech and of the press. The autonomous Icelandic National Broadcasting Service (RÚV) competes with private radio and television stations. Private media ownership is highly concentrated, with the media company 365 controlling most major private television and radio outlets.

Reports emerged in May 2021 claiming that Samherji, a large Icelandic fishing company implicated in a 2019 corruption scandal, had tried to undermine and control public debate by spying on, intimidating, and attacking the credibility of journalists and civil society organizations that had reported on the corruption allegations. In February 2022, police in Akureyri, where Samherji is headquartered, announced that four journalists who had reported on the Samherji scandal were "official suspects" in a breach-of-privacy investigation. The police allege that, while investigating the corruption scandal, the journalists violated the privacy of a Samherji employee; the journalists have denied the allegations. Press freedom groups have expressed concern that the investigation represents an attempt to suppress investigative journalism. The investigation remained ongoing at year's end.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of religion, which is generally upheld in practice. Around 60 percent of Icelanders belong to the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 /4

Academic freedom is respected, and the education system is free of excessive political involvement.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People in Iceland may freely discuss personal views on sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally upheld. In recent years, however, police have faced criticism for arresting or forcefully dispersing peaceful protesters under a broadly worded provision of the Police Law of 1996.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) may form, operate, and fundraise freely, and frequently inform policy discussions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The labor movement is robust, with more than 80 percent of all eligible workers belonging to unions. Most unions have the right to strike, except for the National Police Federation.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent. Judges are proposed by an Interior Ministry selection committee, are formally appointed by the president, and are not subject to term limits. However, in 2017, former justice minister Sigríður Andersen interfered in the selection process for the Court of Appeals when she selected nominees who were considered unqualified. In 2020, the ECtHR ruled that the government violated the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) when a defendant was judged by one of Andersen's nominees.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The law does not provide for trial by jury, but many trials and appeals use panels of several judges. Prison conditions generally meet international standards.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

Police are generally responsive to incidents of violence. War and insurgencies are not a concern. Violent crime is rare, though a slight increase in both gun- and knife-related violence was recorded in 2022. The Minister of Justice announced in December that, for protection from the "growing threat" of weapons-related crime, police would be authorized to carry stun guns.

In September 2022, police announced that four men had been arrested for allegedly planning to commit a domestic terrorist attack; two remained in custody until December, when they were released after being indicted on terrorism-related charges.

The constitution states that all people shall be treated equally before the law, regardless of sex, religion, ethnic origin, race, or other status.

The Directorate of Immigration has repeatedly been accused of using excessive force in carrying out deportations. In 2019, authorities deported an Albanian family—including a heavily pregnant woman who had received medical certification that she was unfit to fly—even though an appeal against their deportation was still under consideration. In 2022, the decision to deport the woman despite her medical status was deemed illegal, and the state agreed to provide her with financial compensation. In November, an Iraqi family seeking asylum in Iceland was deported to Greece; video footage of the deportation showed one member of the family, who is disabled, being forcibly removed from his wheelchair. The family returned to Iceland in December after a court ruled that their deportation had been illegal.

The rate of refugee recognition in Iceland is low compared to other northern European countries. A record number of refugees—totaling approximately 4,000 people—arrived in Iceland during 2022. Although refugees are eligible to receive government services, including housing and employment support, the government sometimes struggled to provide such services in 2022.

Immigrants who do not fluently speak Icelandic often face barriers to employment. Until 2019, noncitizens were prohibited from employment in the public sector.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is constitutionally protected and respected in practice. Although travel to and from Iceland was affected by COVID-19-related regulations, a total lockdown was never imposed. All COVID-19-related restrictions were lifted by February 2022.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

There is generally no undue government interference in business or private property ownership.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Parliament unanimously passed a law legalizing same-sex marriage in 2010, and a 2006 law established full and equal rights for same-sex couples in matters of adoption and assisted pregnancy. Comprehensive legislation on transgender issues ensures full and equal rights for transgender people and guarantees relevant healthcare, among other provisions.

Abortions through the 22nd week of pregnancy are permitted without requiring special approval.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Citizens generally enjoy fair access to economic opportunity. However, the systematic exploitation of migrant workers has become a significant problem in recent years, especially in the tourism industry. Employers who exploit workers have largely acted with impunity due to an inadequate government response. Wage theft is not punishable by law. There are reports of forced labor, primarily involving migrants, in the construction and service industries, and of forced sex work in nightclubs.

Iceland criminalized human trafficking in 2009. In the 2022 edition of its Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department reported that one person had been prosecuted and convicted of trafficking in Iceland during the year, the first such case since 2010.

India

Population: 1,417,200,000
Capital: New Delhi
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Indian Kashmir, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology.

Overview: While India is a multiparty democracy, the government led by Prime Minister Narendra Modi and the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) has presided over discriminatory policies and a rise in persecution affecting the Muslim population. The constitution guarantees civil liberties including freedom of expression and freedom of religion, but harassment of journalists, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and other government critics has increased significantly under Modi. The BJP has increasingly used government institutions to target political opponents. Muslims, scheduled castes (Dalits), and scheduled tribes (Adivasis) remain economically and socially marginalized.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In July, state and national lawmakers elected Droupadi Murmu, the BJP candidate and former governor of Jharkhand, president. Murmu is the first member of India's tribal communities to serve as head of state.
- The ruling BJP maintained control in five states in elections held in March and December. The Aam Aadmi Party (AAP) won in Punjab in March. The opposition Indian National Congress (INC) won in Himachal Pradesh in December, while the AAP dislodged the BJP in Metropolitan Corporation of Delhi (MCD) elections that month.
- In June, thousands of people protested in several states over a BJP spokesperson's remarks that were considered insults of the prophet Muhammad. Authorities responded forcefully; two protesters were killed in the city of Ranchi, where police reportedly attacked bystanders.
- Authorities in several regions demolished Muslim-owned properties during the year. In April, authorities in Delhi, Gujarat, and Madhya Pradesh responded to unrest by demolishing Muslim-owned buildings. Authorities in Uttar Pradesh destroyed Muslim-owned homes in June after protests held that month.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Executive elections and selection procedures are generally regarded as free and fair. Executive power is vested in a prime minister, typically the leader of the majority party in the Lok Sabha (House of the People), and a cabinet of ministers nominated by the prime minister. They are appointed by the president and responsible to the Lok Sabha. Narendra Modi was sworn in for a second term as prime minister after the BJP's victory in the 2019 Lok Sabha elections.

The president, who plays a largely symbolic role, is chosen for a five-year term by state and national lawmakers. In July 2022, lawmakers elected Droupadi Murmu, the BJP-backed candidate and former governor of Jharkhand, president. Murmu, who took office later that month, is the first member of one of India's marginalized tribal communities to hold the position.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

All but 2 members of the 545-seat Lok Sabha, the lower house of Parliament, are directly elected in single-member constituencies for five-year terms; the president appoints the remaining 2 from the country's Anglo Indian community. Most members of the less powerful 245-seat upper house, the Rajya Sabha (Council of States), are elected by state legislatures using a proportional-representation system to serve staggered six-year terms; up to 12 members are appointed by the president.

The most recent Lok Sabha elections were held in seven phases in April and May 2019. The ruling BJP won 303 seats, giving its National Democratic Alliance coalition a stable majority of 353 seats. The opposition INC placed a distant second with 52 seats, for a total of 92 seats with its partners in the United Progressive Alliance. Smaller parties and independents took the remainder. Voter turnout was 67 percent. The elections were considered generally free and fair, though some campaign-rule violations were reported.

Several state elections were held in 2022. In March, the BJP retained control of the state assemblies in Goa, Manipur, Uttarakhand, and Uttar Pradesh, while the AAP won in Punjab. In December, the INC won in Himachal Pradesh, defeating the BJP. The BJP maintained control of Gujarat that same month. Also in December, the BJP lost control of the MCD, which it held for 15 years; the AAP won 134 of its 250 seats, while the BJP won 104.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Elections for the central and state governments are overseen by the independent Election Commission of India, whose head is appointed by the president and serves a fixed six-year term. The commission is generally respected and had been thought to function without undue political interference. In recent years, however, its impartiality and competence have been called into question.

In late 2021, the Lok Sabha passed the Election Laws (Amendment) Act 2021, which creates a framework for linking election-roll data with Aadhaar, India's biometric database. The Internet Freedom Foundation (IFF) objected to the bill, saying it would allow voter profiling, impact voters' privacy, and lead to disenfranchisement. In August 2022, the Hindu reported that electoral officers threatened to remove voters from the roll unless they provided their Aadhaar identification numbers, citing the IFF.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

Political parties are generally able to form without interference, and a wide variety of parties representing a range of views and interests compete in practice. However, the ruling BJP has used various tools to limit campaigning by opposition parties.

The opaque financing of political parties is a serious source of concern. A system of electoral bonds, introduced in 2017, allows donor identities to be known to the State Bank of India but obscured from the public. It has contributed to major fundraising advantages for the BJP. In addition, the government, through the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI), has selectively pursued anticorruption investigations against opposition politicians while overlooking allegations against political allies. In September 2022, the Indian Express reported that the CBI investigated opposition politicians since the BJP came to power far more often, while fewer members of the ruling party were targeted.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Different parties regularly succeed one another in government at the state and national levels. Modi and the BJP took power after the 2014 elections, ending 10 years of INC-led government, and were reelected by a wide margin in 2019. In 2022, the BJP scored victories—either alone or at the head of a coalition—in five states, while the AAP won in Punjab and in the MCD.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Political participation, while generally free, is hampered by insurgent violence in certain areas. Separately, some political actors have sought to inflame communal tensions with the goal of energizing their own supporters while potentially intimidating opponents.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women and members of religious and ethnic minorities vote in large numbers and have opportunities to gain political representation. In 2019, for the first time, the rate of women's voting in national elections equaled that of men. Indian lawmakers selected the country's second-ever woman president when voting for Droupadi Murmu in July 2022. Female representation in the Lok Sabha, however, is low. Women held 15.1 percent of its seats as of December.

Quotas ensure that 84 and 47 Lok Sabha seats are reserved for the so-called scheduled castes and scheduled tribes, respectively. State assemblies and local bodies feature similar quotas for these historically disadvantaged groups, as well as for women representatives.

However, marginalized segments of the population continue to face practical obstacles to full political representation. Muslim candidates notably won 27 of 545 seats in the 2019 Lok Sabha elections, up from 22 previously. However, this amounted to just 5 percent of the seats in the chamber, whereas Muslims made up some 14.2 percent of the population according to the 2011 census. By the end of 2022, no national legislator belonging to the BJP identified as Muslim.

The political rights of India's Muslims continue to be threatened. The Citizenship (Amendment) Act (CAA) of 2019 grants special access to Indian citizenship to non-Muslim immigrants and refugees from neighboring Muslim-majority states. At the same time, the government moved forward with plans for the creation of a national register of citizens. Many observers believe that the register's purpose is to disenfranchise Muslim voters by effectively classifying them as illegal immigrants. Importantly, Muslims disproportionately lack documentation attesting to their place of birth. Undocumented non-Muslims, meanwhile, are eligible for citizenship through a fast-track process under the CAA.

The citizenship status of 1.9 million residents of Assam, which is home to a significant Muslim population, remains in doubt after a citizens' register was finalized in the northeastern state in 2019.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

India's elected leaders have the authority to set government policies, draft and enact legislation, and govern the country's territory in practice.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Large-scale political corruption scandals have repeatedly exposed bribery and other malfeasance, but a great deal of corruption is thought to go unreported and unpunished, and the authorities have been accused of selective, partisan enforcement.

The Lokpal and Lokayuktas Act of 2013 created independent national and state bodies tasked with receiving complaints of corruption against public servants or politicians, investigating such claims, and pursuing convictions through the courts. However, these agencies have been slow to begin operations. Only 7 of the country's 29 state-level Lokayuktas had publicly accessible annual reports as of October 2022. Few complaints were submitted through these bodies.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The public generally has some access to information about government activity, but the legal framework meant to ensure transparency has been eroded in recent years. The 2014 Whistleblowers Protection Act was regarded as limited in scope, and subsequent amendments have drawn criticism for further undermining it.

Millions of requests are made annually under the 2005 Right to Information (RTI) Act, and responses have been used to improve transparency and expose corrupt activities. However, most requesters do not receive the information sought, including those seeking information about core government policies, and noncompliant officials generally go unpunished. Dozens of right-to-information users and activists have been murdered since the RTI Act's introduction, and hundreds have been assaulted or harassed. In 2019, Parliament adopted amendments to the RTI Act that placed the salaries and tenures of the central and state-level information commissioners under the control of the central government, potentially exposing the commissioners to political pressure. National and state-level information commissions are hampered by staff vacancies.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 33 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The private media are somewhat vigorous and diverse, and investigations and scrutiny of politicians do occur. However, attacks on press freedom have escalated dramatically under the Modi government, and reporting has become significantly less ambitious in recent years. Authorities have used security, defamation, sedition, and hate speech laws, as well as contempt-of-court charges, to quiet critical voices in the media. Hindu nationalist campaigns aimed at discouraging forms of expression deemed "antinational" have exacerbated self-censorship. Online disinformation from inauthentic sources is ubiquitous ahead of elections. Separately, revelations of close relationships between politicians, business executives, and lobbyists, on one hand, and leading media personalities and owners of media outlets, on the other, have dented public confidence in the press.

In addition to criminal charges, journalists risk harassment, death threats, and physical violence in the course of their work. Such attacks are rarely punished, and some have taken place with the complicity or active participation of police. In April 2022, the Article 14 news site said five of its journalists were escorted from a Hindu nationalist event in Delhi by police; demonstrators had attacked them when learning that most of them were Muslim. Police in Delhi later launched a case against Article 14 and journalist Meer Faisal for commenting on the incident on Twitter.

Raids on independent outlets have become common. In October 2022, for example, police raided the New Delhi office of the Wire along with the homes of four of its editors. Police acted in response to a complaint lodged by BJP official Amit Malviya, who accused the Wire of defamation over retracted articles suggesting that he had the ability to remove Instagram posts.

In June 2022, Mohammed Zubair, a cofounder of the Alt News fact-checking site, was arrested for allegedly inflaming religious sentiments via a Twitter post. A complainant accused Zubair, a Muslim, of showing disrespect to a Hindu deity. Zubair was later accused of using "offensive" language to describe Hindu religious leaders by the Uttar Pradesh police before receiving bail in July.

While Hindus make up about 80 percent of the population, the Indian state is formally secular, and freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed. However, a number of Hindu nationalist organizations and some media outlets promote anti-Muslim views, a practice that the Modi government has been accused of encouraging. Attacks against Muslims and others in connection with the alleged slaughter or mistreatment of cows, which are held to be sacred by Hindus, continued in 2022. The BJP has faced criticism for failing to mount an adequate response to cow-related violence.

Legislation in several states criminalizes religious conversions that take place as a result of "force" or "allurement," which can be broadly interpreted to prosecute proselytizers. Some states require government permission for conversion.

Communal rioting occurred in multiple states in April 2022, sparked by encounters between Muslims and those celebrating Hindu festivals.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom has significantly weakened in recent years, as professors, students, and institutions have faced intimidation over political and religious issues. Members of the student wing of the Hindu nationalist organization Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (National Volunteer Association)—from which the ruling BJP is widely regarded to have grown—have engaged in violence on campuses across the country, including attacks on students and professors. University administrators and faculty have been investigated, disciplined, or compelled to step down owing to their perceived political views. Academics face pressure not to discuss topics deemed sensitive by the BJP government, particularly India's relations with Pakistan and conditions in Indian Kashmir. The heads of prestigious academic institutions are increasingly selected for their loyalty to the ruling party.

In February 2022, the Karnataka state government banned Muslim students from wearing the hijab in several public institutions. In October, the Supreme Court delivered a split verdict on the issue, with judges calling on the chief justice to send the case to a larger bench.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Personal expression and private discussion in India had long been open and free. However, colonial-era and other laws are often invoked in order to penalize perceived criticism of the government by ordinary citizens. Activists, Muslims, and members of other marginalized communities are routinely charged with sedition for criticizing the government and its policies. In 2021, Article 14 reported a 28 percent annual increase in sedition charges from 2014, when the BJP came to power, to 2020. In May 2022, the Supreme Court put the colonial-era sedition law under review, stayed ongoing related cases, and asked the central and state governments to refrain from filing new cases. The court extended its order in October.

Online "troll armies" associated with the BJP routinely harass individuals—notably Muslims—and organizations for voicing criticism of the government and for engaging in behavior that supposedly deviates from Hindu orthodoxy.

The government has imposed rules that increase social media companies' liability for material posted on their platforms and effectively encourage aggressive content restrictions. In July 2022, Twitter sued the government in the Karnataka High Court to contest orders to remove content critical of the government from its platform.

A nationwide Central Monitoring System is meant to enable authorities to intercept digital communications in real time without judicial oversight. In 2021, a collaborative investigation by news organizations revealed that the government had likely planted Pegasus spyware on the mobile devices of more than 300 prominent individuals, including opposition members, journalists, judges, businesspeople, and minority-rights advocates. In August 2022, a committee of experts formed by the Supreme Court concluded that 5 of the 29 phones it examined were infected with malware but did not conclude if Pegasus was used; the Modi government did not cooperate with the committee.

Also in August 2022, the government withdrew the Personal Data Protection Bill 2019 from parliamentary consideration; among other provisions, it would have imposed restrictions on social media companies' ability to use personal data, though it was criticized for proposing relatively few restrictions on the government itself. The BJP vowed to introduce a new bill to replace it.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

There are legal restrictions on freedom of assembly, including a provision of the criminal procedure code that empowers authorities to restrict public gatherings and impose curfews whenever "immediate prevention or speedy remedy" is required. State and central governments often suspend mobile and internet service to curb protests.

While peaceful demonstrations regularly take place, the national government and some state governments are known to employ assembly bans, internet disruptions, and force to quell protests, while protesters have faced harsh treatment and have been denied access to legal counsel.

Thousands of people in several states, including Gujarat and Uttar Pradesh, held protests in June 2022, objecting to a BJP spokesperson's May remarks that were considered insulting to the prophet Muhammad. Authorities responded with force and police in Jharkhand attacked bystanders. Police killed two people in the city Ranchi, the state capital of Jharkhand, on June 10, with their relatives accusing the authorities of applying disproportionate force. A senior police officer in the city sustained severe injuries. Authorities in several towns applied emergency laws to restrict gatherings. Over 300 people were arrested in Uttar Pradesh alone by June 14.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

A wide variety of NGOs operate, but some, particularly those involved in the investigation of human rights abuses, continue to face threats, legal harassment, excessive police force, and occasionally lethal violence.

Under certain circumstances, the Foreign Contribution (Regulation) Act (FCRA) of 2010 permits the federal government to deny NGOs access to foreign funding, and authorities have been accused of using this power selectively against perceived political opponents. The government cancelled the FCRA registrations of 6,677 NGOs between 2017 and 2021. In October 2022, the government canceled the registrations of two NGOs led by former INC leader Sonia Gandhi. In December, the government said one of the organizations lost its license because it received funding from the Chinese embassy.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Although workers in the formal economy regularly exercise their rights to bargain collectively and strike, laws including the Essential Services Maintenance Act have enabled the government to ban certain strikes. Public employees have more limited organizing rights, and private employers are not legally obliged to recognize unions or engage in bargaining.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary is formally independent of the political branches of government. Judges, particularly in the Supreme Court, have traditionally displayed autonomy and activism in response to public-interest litigation. However, lower levels of the judiciary suffer from corruption, and the courts have shown signs of increasing politicization. The government has also made judicial appointments that observers consider political in nature.

Several key Supreme Court rulings in recent years have been favorable to the BJP, including the 2019 decision allowing the construction of a Hindu temple on the site of a historic mosque and a 2020 decision to deny bail to a scholar and prominent critic of Prime Minister Modi who was charged with supporting a banned Maoist group. In 2022, courts continued to issue rulings favoring the BJP, including in highly controversial cases.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Due process rights are not consistently upheld. Citizens face substantial obstacles in the pursuit of justice, including demands for bribes and difficulty getting the police to file a First Information Report, which is necessary to trigger an investigation of an alleged crime. Corruption within the police force remains a problem. The justice system is severely backlogged and understaffed, leading to lengthy pretrial detention for suspects, many of whom remain in jail longer than the duration of any sentence they might receive if convicted.

A number of security laws allow detention without charge or based on vaguely defined offenses. The Unlawful Activities Prevention Act has been used extensively in recent years to hold individuals for long periods without trial or specific evidence of guilt.

In August 2022, 11 men convicted of crimes against a Muslim family during communal violence in Gujarat in 2002—including gang rape and murder—were released from prison in what was widely regarded as a bid to secure the support of hard-line Hindu voters ahead of the December 2022 state elections.

Torture, abuse, and rape by law enforcement and security officials have been reported. A bill intended to prevent torture remains pending. Abuses by prison staff against people in custody, particularly those belonging to marginalized groups, are common. In July 2022, the Home Affairs Ministry reported that 4,484 people died in judicial or police custody in 2020 and 2021.

Security forces battling regional insurgencies continue to be implicated in extrajudicial killings, rape, torture, kidnappings, and destruction of homes. While the criminal procedure code requires that the government approve the prosecution of security personnel, approval is rarely granted, leading to impunity.

The Maoist insurgency in the east-central hills region of India continues, though the annual number of casualties linked with it has decreased significantly since peaking in 2010. Among other abuses, the rebels have allegedly imposed illegal taxes, seized food and places of shelter, and engaged in abduction and forced recruitment of children and adults. Local civilians and journalists who are perceived to be progovernment have been attacked. Tens of thousands of civilians have been displaced by the violence and live in government-run camps.

Separately, in India's seven northeastern states, more than 40 insurgent factions—seeking either greater autonomy or complete independence for their ethnic or tribal groups—continue to attack security forces and engage in intertribal violence. Such fighters have been implicated in bombings, killings, abductions, and rapes of civilians, and they operate extensive extortion networks.

The constitution bars discrimination based on caste, and laws set aside quotas in education and government jobs for historically underprivileged scheduled tribes, Dalits, and groups categorized by the government as "other backward classes" and "Economically Weaker Sections." However, members of these populations face routine discrimination and violence, and the criminal justice system fails to provide equal protection to marginalized groups.

In parts of the country, particularly in rural areas, informal community councils issue edicts concerning social customs. Their decisions sometimes result in violence or persecution aimed at those perceived to have transgressed social norms, especially women and members of scheduled castes. Other forms of discrimination faced by women include workplace bias and sexual harassment. Indian participation in the international #MeToo movement against sexual harassment and assault has raised awareness of the problem, but women have also endured reprisals after reporting cases, and the movement's reach has largely been limited to the country's urban middle class.

In 2018, the Supreme Court ruled that the use of Section 377 of the penal code to ban same-sex intercourse was unconstitutional, and courts have since pressed state and national authorities to combat discrimination against LGBT+ people. Such discrimination continues, however, sometimes including violence and harassment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4 (+1)

The constitution grants citizens the right to reside and settle in any part of the territory of India. However, freedom of movement is hampered in some parts of the country by insurgent violence or communal tensions. Several states require companies to reserve jobs for locals, limiting opportunities for interstate migration, although enforcement of the quotas is reportedly limited.

India's large internal migrant population suffered significant hardships during the COVID-19 pandemic, as the government imposed an excessively harsh lockdown that offered little assistance or security to low-paid workers. Millions were consequently compelled to travel from cities to their native villages for lack of employment and essential supplies. In 2021, a government think tank published a policy framework that aimed to ease interstate movement among other goals. This situation abated in January 2022 when the national government directed states to shorten coronavirus-related isolation periods.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the government eased COVID-19-related restrictions.

Although the legal framework generally supports the right to own property and engage in private business activity, property rights are somewhat tenuous for tribal groups and other marginalized communities. Members of these groups are often denied adequate resettlement opportunities and compensation when their lands are seized for development projects. While many states have laws to prevent transfers of tribal land to nontribal groups, the practice is reportedly widespread, particularly with respect to the mining and timber industries. Muslim personal status laws and traditional Hindu practices discriminate against women in terms of property rights and inheritance.

Muslim-owned properties were demolished by authorities in several areas in 2022. In April, authorities in Delhi, Gujarat, and Madhya Pradesh responded to communal unrest by demolishing Muslim-owned structures. In June, authorities in Uttar Pradesh destroyed three Muslim-owned houses in an apparent act of reprisal against protests; authorities claimed the homes were illegally constructed. In October, authorities in Madhya Pradesh destroyed three men's homes after they were accused of throwing stones during a Hindu ceremony. In June, three UN special rapporteurs wrote a letter objecting to the practice.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because officials in several areas demolished property owned by Muslims.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Rape and other sexual abuse are serious problems, and scheduled-caste and tribal women are especially vulnerable. Mass demonstrations after the fatal gang rape of a woman on a Delhi bus in 2012 prompted the government to enact significant legal reforms, but egregious rape cases continue to surface. The criminal justice system as well as prominent politicians have been repeatedly faulted for their poor handling of such matters.

Despite criminalization and hundreds of convictions each year, dowry demands surrounding marriage persist, sometimes resulting in violence. A 2006 law banned dowry-related harassment, widened the definition of domestic violence to include emotional or verbal abuse, and criminalized spousal sexual violence, but enforcement is reportedly poor.

In August 2022, the Supreme Court expanded the official definition of the family to include same-sex parents and other households that had been deemed "atypical."

Several BJP-led states have passed or proposed laws meant to stem the alleged practice of "love jihad"—a baseless conspiracy theory according to which Muslims marry Hindu women with the goal of converting them to Islam. The legislation effectively created obstacles to interfaith marriages and raised the risk of legal penalties, harassment, and violence for interfaith couples. In February 2022, the BJP argued for toughening penalties on interfaith marriages ahead of the Uttar Pradesh state elections.

Muslim personal status laws and traditional Hindu practices feature gender discrimination on matters such as marriage, divorce, and child custody. A Muslim divorce custom allowing a man to unilaterally divorce his wife was criminalized in 2019. The malign neglect of female children after birth remains a concern, as does the banned use of prenatal sex-determination tests to selectively abort female fetuses.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

The constitution bans human trafficking, and bonded labor is illegal, but estimates of the number of workers still affected by the practice range from 20 to 50 million. A 2016 law allows children below the age of 14 to engage in "home-based work," as well as other occupations between the ages of 14 and 18. Children are not permitted to work in potentially hazardous industries, though the rule is routinely flouted. The use of child labor reportedly surged during COVID-19 lockdowns, as schools were closed and families faced severe economic hardships. There have been reports of complicity by law enforcement officials in human trafficking.

Indonesia

Population: 275,500,000
Capital: Jakarta
Freedom Status: Partly Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Indonesia has made impressive democratic gains since the fall of an authoritarian regime in 1998, enjoying significant political and media pluralism and undergoing multiple, peaceful transfers of power. Significant challenges persist, including systemic corruption, discrimination and violence against minority groups, conflict in Papua, and the politicized use of defamation and blasphemy laws.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In April, the parliament passed a bill meant to combat sexual violence; it criminalizes sexual harassment, forced contraception and sterilization, forced marriage, sexual torture, slavery and exploitation, and online sexual violence.

- In a June vote, the parliament approved the creation of three new provinces in the Papua region, making for a total of five; the new borders were inaugurated in November. Papuans criticized the change, saying it would further marginalize the region's Indigenous residents.
- The Corruption Eradication Commission (KPK) arrested two Supreme Court judges for allegedly accepting bribes over a case being heard at that court. Sudrajad Dimyati was arrested in September and Gazalba Saleh was arrested in December.
- In December, the parliament approved a new criminal code, which restricts insults directed at government institutions, expands restrictions on blasphemy, and criminalizes cohabitation of unmarried people, among other things. It will take effect after receiving the president's signature and a subsequent three-year transition period.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 30 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The directly elected president serves as both head of state and head of government. Presidents and vice presidents can serve up to two five-year terms. Joko Widodo (known as "Jokowi"), the Indonesian Democratic Party of Struggle (PDI-P) candidate, won a second term as president in the April 2019 election with 55.5 percent of the vote, defeating former general Prabowo Subianto, the Great Indonesia Movement Party (Gerindra) candidate.

Limited voting irregularities were reported, but the contest was largely considered free and fair by international election monitors. Prabowo's campaign claimed the election was marred by widespread fraud and vote rigging, but this claim was rejected by the Constitutional Court that June. Jokowi appointed Prabowo as his defense minister.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The House of Representatives (DPR), the main parliamentary chamber, consists of 575 members elected in 34 multimember districts. The 136-member House of Regional Representatives (DPD) is responsible for monitoring laws related to regional autonomy and may propose bills on the topic. All legislators serve five-year terms with no term limits.

Legislative elections were held concurrently with the presidential and local contests in April 2019. The PDI-P, led by former president Megawati Sukarnoputri, won 19.3 percent of the vote and 128 seats. Golkar, the party of former authoritarian president Suharto, won 85 seats on 12.3 percent, followed by Gerindra with 78 seats and 12.6 percent. Partai NasDem won 59 seats, while the Democratic Party (PD) of former president Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono won 54.

Two Islamic parties—the National Mandate Party (PAN) and the United Development Party (PPP)—lost seats from the last parliament, returning with 44 and 19 seats, respectively. Two other Islamic parties, the National Awakening Party (PKB) and the Prosperous Justice Party (PKS), increased their representation, respectively winning 58 and 50 seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The legal framework for elections is largely democratic, and electoral authorities are mostly seen as impartial. Under a 2012 law, the hereditary sultan of Yogyakarta is that province's unelected governor.

A 2016 revision to the law governing local elections requires the Election Oversight Agency and the General Elections Commission to conduct a binding consultation with the parliament and the government before issuing any new regulations or decisions. Activists expressed concerns that the rules would reduce electoral authorities' independence.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

The right to organize political parties is respected, and several major parties compete for power. Four new parties contested the 2019 elections.

Eligibility requirements favor large parties. The 2017 General Elections Law (UU PU) requires new parties to undergo a "factual verification" process confirming the accuracy of submitted documents on parties' management, membership, and operations.

Communist parties are banned. The promotion of communism is banned under the criminal code passed in December 2022.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Indonesia has established a pattern of democratic power transfers between rival parties since 1999. The most recent handover occurred in 2014, when the PDI-P returned to power after losing the previous two presidential elections. The UU PU requires parties or coalitions fielding presidential candidates to hold 20 percent of the seats in the parliament or 25 percent of the national vote in the most recent parliamentary election. The provision effectively bars new or smaller parties from fielding candidates in the presidential race.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

While voters and candidates are generally free from undue interference, the military remains influential, with former commanders playing prominent roles in politics. Intimidation by nonstate actors—including Islamist groups—remains a problem, as is the growing use of online propaganda in political campaigns.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women enjoy full political rights, and political parties are subject to 30 percent gender quotas for steering committees and candidates. However, women remain underrepresented in electoral politics, holding 21.6 percent of the DPR's seats, though they do sometimes win leadership positions. Puan Maharani, daughter of former president Megawati and granddaughter of former president Sukarno, became the first female DPR speaker in 2019.

Ethnic Chinese are poorly represented in politics and often abstain from voting. Two parties with ethnic Chinese leaders, the Indonesian Solidarity Party (PSI) and United Indonesian Party (Perindo), contested the April 2019 elections; neither exceeded the 4-percent parliamentary threshold for seats.

Some local governments have discriminated against religious minorities by restricting access to identification cards, birth certificates, marriage licenses, and other bureaucratic necessities, limiting their political rights and electoral opportunities.

LGBT+ people are poorly represented in electoral politics.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials generally determine government policies, though national authorities have faced difficulties in implementing their decisions due to local-level resistance. Observers have warned that the military is regaining its influence over civilian governance and economic affairs. These concerns increased following the COVID-19 pandemic, as generals headed both the National Task Force for COVID-19 Management and the Ministry of Health.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains endemic in the national and local legislatures, civil service, judiciary, and police. The most common offenses are embezzlement, bribery, and extortion. Acrimony between rival agencies—particularly the KPK and the National Police—has hindered anticorruption efforts, and civilian investigators have no jurisdiction over the military. In 2019, the parliament passed legislation weakening the KPK, requiring all employees to join the civil service and investigators to be from the National Police.

In September 2022, the Law and Human Rights Ministry paroled 23 people convicted of graft in a decision criticized by activists and the KPK.

Also in September, the KPK arrested Supreme Court justice Sudrajad Dimyati—who allegedly accepted bribes over a case being heard by that court—along with a clerk and eight other individuals. In December, the KPK arrested Supreme Court justice Gazalba Saleh for his alleged involvement in the affair.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Although civil society groups comment on and influence pending policies or legislation, government transparency is limited by broad exemptions in the freedom of information law and obstacles such as a 2011 law criminalizing leaking vaguely defined "state secrets" to the public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 28 / 60 (−1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Indonesia hosts a vibrant and diverse media environment, though legal and regulatory restrictions hamper press freedom. The 2008 Law on Electronic Information and Transactions (UU ITE) extended libel to online media. It also criminalized distribution or accessibility of information or documents "contrary to the moral norms of Indonesia," or involving gambling, blackmail, or defamation. Journalists carrying out legitimate reporting have been arrested under the UU ITE.

Foreign journalists visiting the Papua region face bureaucratic obstacles and deportation. Internet blackouts during protests as well as self-censorship have inhibited press activity. Journalists covering sensitive subjects, including LGBT+ issues, organized crime, sexual assault, and corruption, face harassment, violence, and threats. In March 2022, a student-run publication was shuttered by the State Islamic Institute in Ambon after it reported on sexual violence on campus. Two student journalists were physically assaulted on campus by men claiming to be relatives of an accused perpetrator.

A 2020 directive allowed for up to 18 months' imprisonment for "hostile information about the president and government" or coronavirus-related disinformation. In a 2022 report, Amnesty International Indonesia found that attacks against journalists where police officers were the alleged perpetrators increased in subsequent years.

Journalists regularly face physical and digital attack. Amnesty International Indonesia documented 133 such incidents against 225 journalists and outlets between January 2019 and May 2022.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Indonesia officially recognizes Islam, Protestantism, Roman Catholicism, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Confucianism. Individuals may leave the "religion" section on their identity cards blank, but those who do—including adherents of unrecognized faiths—often face discrimination. Atheism is not accepted legally. The criminal code passed in December 2022 prohibits blasphemy; those who "incite" someone to convert or refrain from religious adherence would face imprisonment.

National and local governments often fail to protect religious minorities and exhibit bias in investigations and prosecutions. Building a new house of worship requires signatures of 90 congregation members and 60 local residents of different faiths. As of 2022, the government was still reconsidering the 2006 Joint Ministerial Decision on houses of worship, which has been cited as a driver of religious conflict.

Violence and intimidation against Ahmadi and Shiite communities persists. In 2021, an Ahmadiyya mosque in West Kalimantan was destroyed by a mob. In January 2022, 21 people received four-and-a-half-month prison sentences over its destruction, leaving prison two weeks after sentencing for time served.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Threats to academic freedom have increased in recent years. Hard-line groups and others are known to threaten discussions on LGBT+ matters, interfaith issues, Papua, police violence, and the 1965–66 anticommunist massacres. Academics have been charged with defamation and removed from their posts for criticism of public officials.

Public academic discussions regarding Papua have been canceled and organizers surveilled and threatened. Students, student union leaders, and others involved in Papua-related campus protests continue to face intimidation, arrest, and treason charges, with authorities linking protests to secessionist movements.

University rectors have reported pressure from the Education Ministry to curb student protests. The education minister's vote accounts for 35 percent of the total vote share in the election of university rectors, making selection dependent upon their relationship with the ministry.

A 2021 presidential regulation declared that Indonesia's national philosophical ideology, Pancasila, would guide research and innovation policy. Academics fear authorities could use this decree to prohibit research deemed incompatible with Pancasila.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Laws against blasphemy, defamation, and certain other forms of speech sometimes inhibit expression of personal views on sensitive topics, especially online. Amnesty International Indonesia reported that the UU ITE was used against at least 332 people between January 2019 and May 2022. Under the criminal code passed in December 2022, those who insult government institutions verbally or in writing would face imprisonment or fines. The new code would also prohibit public attacks on the "honor or dignity" of the president or vice president, including through technological means.

In 2020, the National Police issued instructions to surveil activists online and engage in creating progovernment counternarratives. The 2021 creation of the Virtual Police unit within the National Police has reportedly led to self-censorship.

Ministerial Regulation 5 (MR5) requires private digital services and platforms to register with the Ministry of Communication and Information Technology or risk being blocked. Critics allege that MR5 poses privacy and freedom-of-speech risks and provides a tool for government to censor legitimate speech by placing undue burdens on platforms and services.

Civil servants are subject to restrictions on online activity. A government task force reviews "radical" social media comments from civil servants, including perceived insults or criticisms of Pancasila, the state motto, the constitution, or the government. Civil servants cannot join organizations deemed to insult the country's governing principles.

The government is known to surveil and detain individuals who discuss separatism in Maluku or Papua or fly the Papuan Morning Star or the Republic of South Maluku flag. In August 2022, seven people were convicted of treason for raising the Morning Star and received 10-month prison terms.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Protests are common and freedom of assembly is generally upheld, but recent years have seen increasing use of protest-related internet disruptions. Assemblies addressing sensitive political topics—such as the 1965–66 massacres or regional separatism—are regularly dispersed, with participants facing intimidation or violence from vigilantes or police.

Freedom of assembly in Papua is increasingly restricted. Authorities used sometimes-deadly violence in response to protesters objecting to the creation of new provinces in the region in 2022.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

A 2013 law requires nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to register with the government and submit to regular reviews of their activities. The law targets NGOs that commit blasphemy or espouse ideas conflicting with Pancasila, such as atheism and communism. The government can dissolve noncompliant organizations without judicial oversight.

Authorities and influential Muslim organizations continue to intimidate and harass LGBT+ communities, organizations, and activists, hampering groups seeking to provide services to LGBT+ people.

Activists working to address human rights violations in Papua and expose endemic corruption are often targeted by authorities or progovernment supporters. In March 2022, human rights activists Haris Azhar and Fatia Maulidiyanti were formally charged with defaming government minister Luhut Pandjaitan under the UU ITE. The charges stemmed from a 2021 YouTube video in which Azhar and Maulidiyanti discussed the military's involvement in mining activity in Papua.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers can join unions, bargain collectively, and, with the exception of civil servants, stage strikes. Strikes can be unduly delayed by obligatory arbitration processes, and laws against antiunion discrimination and retaliation are poorly enforced. Under a memorandum of understanding signed in 2018, the military can assist police in dealing with strikes and demonstrations.

The 2020 omnibus law abolished sectoral minimum wages and limits unions' negotiating power, with wages set by geography. The law, which was formulated without union consultation, extends outsourcing and reduced the number of statutory days off.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary has demonstrated its independence in some cases, particularly in the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court. However, the court system remains plagued by corruption and other weaknesses. Judicial decisions can be influenced by religious considerations.

Indonesia's Human Rights Court heard its first case since 2004 in 2022, in which a retired military officer was accused of unlawfully killing Papuan protesters in 2014. The defendant was acquitted in December 2022. Some observers considered the judges' performance promising, though the lawyer representing victims' families voiced distrust over the trial.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Police reportedly engage in arbitrary arrests and detentions, particularly of protesters or activists suspected of separatism. Existing safeguards against coerced confessions are ineffective, and defendants are sometimes denied proper access to legal counsel, including in death penalty cases.

In 2021, the government began designating Papuan separatists as terrorists under the 2018 antiterrorism law; such individuals had previously faced treason charges under the criminal code. Activists criticized the move, warning it would allow the authorities to hold people without charge for long periods.

Aceh Province uses Sharia (Islamic law) to guide punishments and regulations. A number of districts and provinces additionally have unconstitutional Sharia-based ordinances that contradict Indonesia's international human rights commitments.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Deadly confrontations involving security forces remain common in the Papua region, and have increased in geographic scope, intensity, and frequency since 2018. In 2021, the government designated "armed criminal groups" as terrorist organizations, granting law enforcement greater detention powers and more resources. Military operations intensified that year, after the death of a brigadier general in Papua's Central Highlands. Security forces have been implicated in torture and extrajudicial killings; six soldiers were accused of killing and mutilating four Indigenous residents of the Papua region in August 2022. Separatists have also targeted security forces and civilians at higher rates.

Military personnel accused of crimes against civilians are tried in military courts, which lack impartiality and often impose light punishments, even for serious human rights violations. Torture by law enforcement agencies is not explicitly criminalized.

Prisons are overcrowded and corrupt, leading to riots, protests, fires, and jailbreaks. Violence related to natural resource extraction remains a problem.

In Aceh, regulations under Sharia permit provincial authorities to use caning as punishment for offenses related to gambling, alcohol consumption, and illicit sexual activity.

Papuans face racial discrimination, including from authorities and political parties.

Some national laws and numerous local ordinances discriminate against women either explicitly or in effect. LGBT+ people suffer from widespread discrimination, inflammatory and discriminatory rhetoric from authorities, and attacks by hard-line Islamist groups. Ethnic Chinese, who make up approximately 1 percent of the population, are vulnerable to harassment.

Indonesia grants temporary protection to refugees and migrants but is not party to the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and does not accept refugees for asylum and resettlement. However, 13,700 registered refugees and asylum seekers resided there as of 2022, most of them seeking to travel to their ultimate destination. Those in transit have limited access to health-care services and none for the formal labor market. While the Indonesian government recognizes the principle of nonrefoulement, these individuals are at risk of deportation in practice.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16 (−1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4 (−1)

Freedoms to travel and change one's place of residence, employment, or higher education are generally respected. However, Indonesians engaging in these administrative processes are sometimes vulnerable to bribery. Papuans have additionally faced restrictions on movement from security forces; residents in Intan Jaya Regency reported that they must ask security officers' permission to move about, are questioned about their movements, and are subjected to checks.

In March 2022, UN experts expressed concern over ongoing violence and internal displacement in the Papua region. Some 5,000 Indigenous Papuans were displaced between April and November 2021 according to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR). The OHCHR also counted at least 60,000 internally displaced persons (IDPs) since December 2018. IDPs often flee without their identity cards, leaving them without access to services.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to increases in the forced displacement of Indigenous Papuans, as well as restrictions on movement for civilians in the Papua region related to escalating armed conflict.

Despite a robust private sector, corruption hampers business activity. Property rights are threatened by state appropriation and licensing of communally owned land to companies, particularly impacting Indigenous communities and others with unregistered or customary land rights. Women have relatively poor rights to marital property. Ethnic Chinese in Yogyakarta face restrictions on private property ownership under a 1975 decree contravening national laws.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Abortion is illegal except as life-saving treatment or in instances of rape. Adults over the age of 15 must have corroboration and witnesses to bring rape charges.

In April 2022, the parliament passed a sexual violence bill, which criminalizes sexual harassment, forced contraception and sterilization, forced marriage, sexual torture, slavery and exploitation, and online sexual violence.

The criminal code approved by the parliament in December 2022 prohibits cohabitation of unmarried people as well as consensual extramarital sex; Human Rights Watch (HRW) warned that millions of couples who lack marriage certificates would run afoul of the new code. The criminal code also prohibits the dissemination of information on contraception to minors.

The minimum age for marriage is set at 19. Marriages must be conducted under the supervision of a recognized religion, which obstructs interfaith marriages.

Local Sharia-based ordinances in many districts impose restrictions on dress, gambling, alcohol use, and sexual activity; these ordinances are disproportionately enforced against women and LGBT+ people. Public displays of affection are banned in Aceh Province under Sharia-based regulations.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Authorities set standards for working conditions and compensation, but enforcement is inconsistent. Indonesian workers are trafficked domestically and abroad, including women in domestic service and men in the fishing industry. In January 2022, authorities in North Sumatra discovered a cage used to detain workers on a plantation operated by a local regent.

Iran

Population: 88,600,000
Capital: Tehran
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The Islamic Republic of Iran holds elections regularly, but they fall short of democratic standards due in part to the influence of the hard-line Guardian Council, an unelected body that disqualifies all candidates it deems insufficiently loyal to the clerical establishment. Ultimate power rests in the hands of the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and the unelected institutions under his control. These institutions, including the security forces and the judiciary, play a major role in the suppression of dissent and other restrictions on civil liberties.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- Protesters mounted mass demonstrations in more than 100 cities across the country beginning in September. They called for freedom and denounced state violence against women in response to the death of Mahsa Amini, a 22-year-old Kurdish woman who had been arrested and beaten by the so-called morality police in Tehran for allegedly not wearing her hijab properly.
- Security forces responded to the protests with a violent crackdown, reportedly using live ammunition, water cannons, tear gas, and beatings against demonstrators. The deaths of nearly 500 people had been confirmed by year's end, and an estimated 14,000 people were arrested, including protesters as well as journalists, lawyers, activists, artists, and athletes who voiced support for the movement. The crackdown was particularly harsh among ethnic and religious minority populations in Iran's Kurdish region and the province of Sistan and Baluchistan.

- Torture and rape of detained protesters was reported, and in December two men were executed in connection with the protests following summary trials without due process. At least 40 others had received death sentences and remained at risk of imminent execution at year's end.
- The regime continued a recent trend of sharp increases in the overall number of executions, reportedly putting more than 500 people to death over the course of the year—the highest such figure since 2017. The surge was driven in part by a rise in the number of executions for drug-related offenses.
- In September, the country's Supreme Council for Cyberspace quietly implemented parts of a highly controversial bill that had yet to win parliamentary approval, appointing representatives from the security forces to a new commission with broad powers to regulate online content and internet access. After the outbreak of protests later that month, the authorities severely disrupted internet service and blocked access to the social media platforms Instagram and WhatsApp.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 4 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The supreme leader, who has no fixed term, is the highest authority in the country. He is the commander in chief of the armed forces and appoints the head of the judiciary, the heads of state broadcast media, and the Expediency Council—a body tasked with mediating disputes between the Guardian Council and the parliament. He also appoints six members of the Guardian Council; the other six are jurists nominated by the head of the judiciary and confirmed by the parliament, all for six-year terms. The supreme leader is appointed by the Assembly of Experts, which monitors his work. However, in practice his decisions appear to go unchallenged by the assembly, whose proceedings are kept confidential. The current supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, succeeded Islamic Republic founder Ruhollah Khomeini in 1989.

The president, the second-highest-ranking official in the Islamic Republic, appoints a cabinet that must be confirmed by the parliament. He is elected by popular vote for up to two consecutive four-year terms. Ebrahim Raisi, then head of the judiciary, won the presidency in June 2021 with 62 percent of the vote in a heavily manipulated contest. The Guardian Council had rejected most of the nearly 600 aspiring candidates—including 40 women—in May 2021, approving only seven applicants. Among those rejected were outgoing first vice president Eshaq Jahangiri, a reformist, and former parliament speaker Ali Larijani, a conservative. Three approved candidates dropped out several days before the poll.

The election was also affected by official pressure on the media, with journalists told to refrain from issuing reports that were critical of the balloting or Raisi. Voter turnout, at just 48.8 percent, was the lowest for a presidential election in the Islamic Republic's history.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Members of the 290-seat parliament are elected to four-year terms. Elections for the body were held in 2020, with most seats going to hard-liners and conservatives loyal to the supreme leader. Ahead of the vote, the Guardian Council disqualified more than 9,000 of the 16,000 people who had registered to run, including large numbers of reformist and moderate candidates. Voter turnout, the lowest for parliamentary elections in the history of the Islamic Republic at 42.6 percent, was likely depressed by factors including the mass disqualifications and the announcement of the first COVID-19 cases just two days before the balloting. The outbreak was believed to have begun weeks earlier, raising suspicions that the authorities delayed disclosing it for political reasons; Khamenei denounced foreign "propaganda" for supposedly exaggerating the health threat to frighten voters.

Elections for the Assembly of Experts, a group of 86 clerics chosen by popular vote to serve eight-year terms, were last held in 2016. Only 20 percent of the would-be candidates were approved to run, a record low. A majority of the new assembly ultimately chose hard-line cleric Ahmad Jannati, head of the Guardian Council, as the body's chairman. Jannati was reelected to the Assembly of Experts' chairmanship in 2021. In July 2022, the 95-year-old Jannati was also retained as the head of the Guardian Council following an order by Khamenei.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The electoral system in Iran does not meet international democratic standards. The Guardian Council, controlled by hard-line conservatives and ultimately by the supreme leader, vets all candidates for the parliament, the presidency, and the Assembly of Experts. The council typically rejects candidates who are not considered insiders or deemed fully loyal to the clerical establishment, as well as women seeking to run in the presidential election. As a result, Iranian voters are given a strictly limited choice of candidates.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

Only political parties and factions loyal to the establishment and to the state ideology are permitted to operate. Reformist groups have come under increased state repression, especially since 2009, and affiliated politicians are subject to arbitrary detention and imprisonment on vague criminal charges.

While some space for shifts in power between approved factions within the establishment has existed in the past, the unelected components of the constitutional system represent a permanent barrier to opposition electoral victories and genuine rotations of power. In May 2021, for example, then outgoing first vice president Jahangiri, who is considered a reformist, was disqualified from running for president.

Top opposition figures face restrictions on their movement. Mir Hossein Mousavi, Zahra Rahnavard, and Mehdi Karroubi—leaders of the reformist Green Movement, whose protests were violently suppressed following the disputed 2009 presidential election—have been under house arrest without formal charges since 2011. Restrictions on Mousavi and Karroubi have sometimes been loosened in recent years. Reformist former president Mohammad Khatami is the subject of a media ban that prohibits the press from mentioning him and publishing his photos. Former hard-line president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who fell out of favor for challenging Khamenei, was barred from running in the 2017 and 2021 presidential elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The choices of both voters and politicians are heavily influenced and ultimately circumscribed by Iran's unelected state institutions and ruling clerical establishment.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Men from the Shiite Muslim majority population dominate the political system. Women remain significantly underrepresented in politics and government. While President Raisi appointed Ensieh Khazali as vice president for women and family affairs in September 2021, he nominated no women to serve in the cabinet the month before. No women candidates have ever been allowed to run for president.

Five seats in the parliament are reserved for recognized non-Muslim minority groups: Jews, Armenian Christians, Assyrian and Chaldean Christians, and Zoroastrians. However, members of non-Persian ethnic minorities and especially non-Shiite religious minorities are rarely awarded senior government posts, and their political representation remains weak.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The elected president's powers are limited by the supreme leader and other unelected authorities. The June 2021 presidential election was tightly controlled by the regime, further reducing the democratic legitimacy of the executive.

The powers of the elected parliament are similarly restricted by the supreme leader and the unelected Guardian Council, which must approve all bills before they can become law. The council often rejects bills it deems un-Islamic. Nevertheless, the parliament has been a platform for heated political debate and criticism of the government, and legislators have frequently challenged presidents and their policies.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption remains endemic at all levels of the bureaucracy, despite regular calls by authorities to tackle the problem. Powerful actors involved in the economy, including the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) and bonyads (endowed foundations), are above scrutiny in practice, and restrictions on the media and civil society activists prevent them from serving as independent watchdogs to ensure transparency and accountability.

Authorities have resisted recent attempts to uncover official corruption. In July 2021, four journalists working for state-run news sites were convicted of defamation and disseminating false news after they reported on suspected corruption in the Oil Ministry, though they reportedly received no prison terms. In July 2022, activist Vahid Ashtari received a two-year prison sentence and was banned from media-related activities after he revealed information about a controversial shopping trip taken earlier in the year by the family of parliament speaker Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The transparency of Iran's governing system is extremely limited in practice, and powerful elements of the state and society are not accountable to the public. A 2009 access to information law, for which implementing regulations were finally adopted in 2015, grants broadly worded exemptions allowing the protection of information whose disclosure would conflict with state interests, cause financial loss, or harm public security, among other stipulations.

The ruling establishment has actively suppressed or manipulated information on important topics. For example, officials are known to promote COVID-19-related disinformation; in January 2021, the supreme leader banned the use of vaccines produced in the United States and Britain, calling them "completely untrustworthy." Nevertheless, the country accepted US- and British-developed vaccines that were manufactured in other countries.

In response to the protests triggered by the death of Mahsa Amini in September 2022, authorities tightly restricted access to related information, including the number, status, and treatment of arrested demonstrators and other political prisoners.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 8 / 60 (−2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 1 / 16 (−1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Media freedom is severely limited both online and offline. The state broadcasting company is tightly controlled by hard-liners and influenced by the security apparatus. News and analysis are heavily censored, while critics and opposition members are rarely, if ever, given a platform on state-controlled television, which remains a major source of information for many Iranians. State television has a record of airing confessions extracted from political prisoners under duress, and it routinely carries reports aimed at discrediting dissidents and opposition activists.

Newspapers and magazines face censorship and warnings from authorities about which topics to cover and how. Tens of thousands of foreign-based websites are filtered, including news sites and major social media services. Satellite dishes are banned, and Persian-language broadcasts from outside the country are regularly jammed. Police periodically raid private homes and confiscate satellite dishes. Iranian authorities have intimidated journalists working for Persian-language media outside the country, in part by summoning and threatening their families in Iran.

Amid the nationwide protests that began in September 2022, authorities arrested dozens of journalists, and at least 62 were behind bars of as of early December, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ). Shargh newspaper reporter Niloofar Hamedi, who was among the first to report about Amini's hospitalization, and Hammihan reporter Elahe Mohammadi, who was attempting to cover Amini's funeral, were among those arrested. Authorities also attempted to suppress coverage of the protest movement by imposing severe restrictions on internet services, including curbs on access to the social media platforms Instagram and WhatsApp.

Iran is home to a majority Shiite Muslim population and Sunni Muslim, Baha'i, Christian, and Zoroastrian minorities. The constitution recognizes only Zoroastrians, Jews, and certain Christian communities as non-Muslim religious minorities, and these small groups are relatively free to worship. The regime cracks down on Muslims who are deemed to be at variance with the state ideology and interpretation of Islam.

Sunni Muslims complain that they have been prevented from building mosques in major cities and face difficulty obtaining government jobs. In recent years, there has been increased pressure on the Sufi Muslim order Nematollahi Gonabadi, including destruction of its places of worship and the jailing of some of its members. In September 2022, new charges were brought against jailed journalist Kasra Nouri, a member of the Gonabadi dervish community, who had been arrested in 2018 following violent clashes between dervishes and security forces. The new charges accused Nouri of signing a statement with other political prisoners.

The government also subjects some non-Muslim minority groups to repressive policies and discrimination, including Baha'is and unrecognized Christian groups. Baha'is are systematically persecuted, sentenced to prison, and banned from access to higher education. Beginning in July 2022, the clerical establishment intensified its crackdown on the Baha'i faith, arresting or imprisoning dozens of people, demolishing homes, and confiscating property, especially in the northern province of Mazandaran.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom remains limited in Iran. Khamenei has warned that universities should not be turned into centers for political activities. Students have been prevented from continuing their studies for political reasons or because they belong to the Baha'i community. Foreign scholars visiting Iran are vulnerable to detention on trumped-up charges.

Since Raisi became president, students have reported tighter restrictions, including stricter hijab rules, which prompted protests in April 2022. Separately, in January it was reported that three university professors who were widely praised for their work had been dismissed, allegedly for political reasons. In June, an appeals court upheld 16-year prison sentences for two elite university students who had been convicted in April of endangering national security, destroying public facilities, cooperating with opposition groups, and other charges that were rejected by their families. Amnesty International said the two, Ali Younesi and Amirhossein Moradi, had been tortured in detention and held in prolonged solitary confinement.

As part of their efforts to suppress the nationwide protests that began in September, authorities raided university campuses and arrested several hundred students.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4 (−1)

Iran's vaguely defined restrictions on speech, harsh criminal penalties, and state monitoring of online communications are among several factors that deter citizens from engaging in open and free private discussion. Despite the risks and limitations, many do express dissent on social media, in some cases circumventing official blocks on certain platforms.

In September 2022, the Supreme Council for Cyberspace quietly implemented three articles of a draft bill under consideration by the parliament, establishing a reorganized regulatory commission that included representatives of the security forces and had extensive authority over online content and services.

After mass protests began later in September, authorities arrested thousands of people, including celebrities, human rights defenders, and others who had expressed support for the movement through posts on social media or by publicly disobeying the hijab requirements that had led to Mahsa Amini's arrest and death. The IRGC called on the judiciary to prosecute anyone spreading "false news and rumors."

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to the regime's expansive efforts to punish anyone who expressed support for a nationwide protest movement, including through social media posts or refusal to obey dress codes in public places.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The constitution states that public demonstrations may be held if they are not "detrimental to the fundamental principles of Islam." In practice, only state-sanctioned demonstrations are typically permitted, while other gatherings have in recent years been forcibly dispersed by security personnel, who detain and use lethal violence against participants.

In 2022, authorities responded harshly to nationwide protests triggered by the September death of Mahsa Amini after her arrest and beating by enforcers of official hijab requirements. Nearly 500 people had been killed in the ensuing violence by year's end. Security forces used water cannons and tear gas against protesters, but fired birdshot and live rounds as well, according to Amnesty International and other sources. Videos posted online showed security personnel violently beating demonstrators, including women. Authorities were also accused of using rape and other sexual violence to suppress protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that seek to address human rights violations are generally suppressed by the state. For example, the Center for Human Rights Defenders (CHRD) remains banned, with several of its members imprisoned. In 2021, CHRD vice president Narges Mohammadi was sentenced in absentia to two-and-a-half years' imprisonment and 80 lashes. She was taken into custody by intelligence agents that November, after which she was sent to Tehran's Evin prison to serve her sentence. She received multiple additional prison sentences in 2022.

Groups that focus on apolitical issues also face crackdowns. In May 2022, an appeals court upheld a 2021 ruling to dissolve the Imam Ali Popular Students Relief Society, a prominent NGO that supported the poor and survivors of natural disasters. In the 2021 decision, the court sustained an Interior Ministry assertion that the NGO had deviated from its mission and "questioned Islamic rulings."

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Iran does not permit the creation of labor unions; only state-sponsored labor councils are allowed. Labor rights groups have come under pressure in recent years, with key leaders and activists sentenced to prison on national security charges. Workers who engage in strikes are vulnerable to dismissal and arrest. Despite such reprisals, labor protests have increased in recent years due to growing economic hardship. In June 2022, the Iranian Teachers' Union's Coordination Council reported that more than 100 teachers had been arrested the previous day for participating in a nationwide protest calling for improved working conditions and the release of previously imprisoned teachers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16 (−1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

While the courts have a degree of autonomy within the ruling establishment, the judicial system is regularly used as a tool to silence regime critics and opposition members. The head of the judiciary is appointed by the supreme leader for renewable five-year terms. Deputy head Gholamhossein Mohseni Ejei was named to the judiciary's top post in July 2021, succeeding Raisi after he won election as president. Ejei had previously served as an intelligence minister and prosecutor general.

Political dissidents and advocates of human and labor rights have continued to face arbitrary judgments, and the security apparatus's influence over the courts has reportedly grown in recent years.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4 (−1)

The authorities routinely violate basic due process standards, particularly in politically sensitive cases. Activists are arrested without warrants, held indefinitely without formal charges, and denied access to legal counsel or any contact with the outside world. Many are later convicted on vague security charges in trials that sometimes last only a few minutes.

An estimated 14,000 people were arrested in connection with the antiestablishment protests that began in September 2022, and due process violations were reportedly widespread. More than 40 of the detainees were sentenced to death, and many were reportedly denied access to legal counsel of their choice and were forced to accept state-appointed lawyers who took little action to defend them. Their trials were extremely brief and relied on confessions obtained under duress. At least two of the convicted defendants were known to have been executed by year's end, and many others awaiting trial faced charges that carried the death penalty.

Lawyers who take up the cases of dissidents have been jailed and banned from practicing, and a number have been forced to leave the country to escape prosecution. In 2019, prominent human rights lawyer Nasrin Sotoudeh was reportedly sentenced to an additional 33 years in prison and 148 lashes for her activities; she had been in prison serving a five-year sentence since mid-2018. In 2020, Sotoudeh was temporarily released amid concerns about her health following a hunger strike; she remained on leave as of late 2022. During the 2022 protests, authorities arrested at least 44 lawyers, including defense attorneys who represented demonstrators. Some of the detained attorneys were also targeted after taking part in protests led by lawyers in Tehran and Shiraz.

Earlier in the year, in June 2022, the authorities sentenced five individuals—three lawyers, an activist, and a human rights defender—to prison terms ranging from 95 days to four years on charges of colluding to commit crimes against national security. When they were arrested in 2021, the five had been preparing to file a lawsuit alleging that state officials had mismanaged the COVID-19 pandemic. An appeals court upheld the sentences in August.

Dual nationals and those with connections abroad have also faced arbitrary detention, trumped-up charges, and denial of due process rights in recent years. In July 2022, reports emerged that Iranian authorities had been detaining Belgian aid worker Olivier Vandecasteele in isolation for several months, and that his health was deteriorating. In December, it was reported that Vandecasteele had been sentenced to 28 years in prison on dubious espionage and money-laundering charges.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the authorities, in response to nationwide protests, carried out thousands of arrests and detentions, as well as a number of summary trials and executions, without observing basic due process safeguards.

Former detainees have reported being beaten during arrest and subjected to torture until they confess to crimes dictated by their interrogators. Some crimes can be formally punished with lashes in addition to imprisonment or fines. Political prisoners have repeatedly engaged in hunger strikes in recent years to protest mistreatment in custody. In 2021, Amnesty International reported that at least 72 prisoners had died in custody since 2010; most of these deaths were caused by torture, the use of firearms or tear gas, or other ill-treatment.

Prisons are overcrowded, and prisoners often complain of poor detention conditions, including denial of medical care. Video recordings taken in Evin prison and distributed in 2021 captured incidents in which prisoners were assaulted or mistreated, along with evidence of overcrowding. Criminal cases against six prison guards were opened as a result of the leaked videos. In October 2022, a series of fires destroyed parts of Evin prison under unclear circumstances, killing at least eight people. Security forces reportedly attacked prisoners who attempted to flee the blazes.

Iran has generally been second only to China in the number of executions it carries out, putting hundreds of people to death each year. Convicts can be executed for offenses other than murder, such as drug trafficking, and for crimes they committed when they were younger than 18 years old. Legislation enacted in 2017 significantly increased the quantity of illegal drugs required for a drug-related crime to incur the death penalty, prompting sentence reviews for thousands of death-row inmates. However, the number of executions has increased since Raisi took office as president. According to the Norway-based group Iran Human Rights, more than 500 people were executed during 2022, compared with 333 in 2021 and 267 in 2020.

In addition to the violence stemming directly from state repression, the country faces a long-term security threat from terrorist and insurgent groups that recruit among disadvantaged Kurdish, Arab, and Sunni Muslim minority populations.

Women do not receive equal treatment under the law and face widespread discrimination in practice. For example, a woman's testimony in court is given half the weight of a man's, and the monetary compensation awarded to a female victim's family upon her death is half that owed to the family of a male victim.

A majority of the population is of Persian ethnicity, and members of ethnic minorities experience various forms of discrimination, including restrictions on the use of their languages. Some provinces with large non-Persian populations remain underdeveloped. Activists campaigning for the rights of ethnic minority groups and greater autonomy for their respective regions have come under pressure from the authorities, and some have been jailed. The Kurdish population played an important role in the 2022 protests triggered by the death of Mahsa Amini, who was Kurdish, and the state crackdown was especially heavy in Kurdish areas. Disproportionate numbers of protest-related deaths were also reported in Sistan and Baluchistan Province, where Sunni Muslim, ethnic Baluch residents form a majority.

Members of the LGBT+ community face harassment and discrimination, though the problem is underreported due to the criminalized and hidden nature of these groups in Iran. The penal code criminalizes all sexual relations outside of traditional marriage, and Iran is among the few countries where individuals can be put to death for consensual same-sex conduct. In September 2022, a rights group reported that two LGBT+ activists had been sentenced to death for supposedly promoting homosexuality. The judiciary confirmed the sentence but said the case was connected to human trafficking.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement is restricted, particularly for women and perceived opponents of the regime. Many journalists and activists have been prevented from leaving the country. Women are banned from certain public places and can generally obtain a passport to travel abroad only with the permission of their fathers or husbands. In August 2022, authorities allowed women to attend a professional domestic soccer game. Women had been barred from attending soccer matches in stadiums since the 1979 revolution, but in recent years a limited number of women have been allowed into stadiums for international matches amid increased pressure on Iran to remove the ban.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Iranians have the legal right to own property and establish private businesses. However, powerful institutions like the IRGC play a dominant role in the economy, limiting fair competition and opportunities for entrepreneurs, and bribery is said to be widespread in the business environment, including for registration and obtaining licenses. Women are denied equal rights in inheritance matters.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Social freedoms are restricted in Iran. All residents, but particularly women, are subject to obligatory rules on dress and personal appearance, and those who are deemed to have violated the rules face state harassment, fines, and arrest. It was reported in July 2022 that officials in Qom had closed three cafés due the presence of female customers who were not wearing headscarves. In early September 2022, the secretary of the regime's Headquarters for Promoting Virtue and Preventing Vice said that authorities were planning to use facial recognition technology in public places to identify women who were not obeying official hijab requirements.

Following Mahsa Amini's death in September 2022, an increasing number of women appeared in public without their headscarves as an act of civil disobedience. Dozens were arrested, including a number of prominent actresses. The police unit that enforces the hijab rules reportedly disappeared from the streets of major cities, however, and in December 2022 an official stated that morality patrols had been abolished.

Police have long conducted raids on private gatherings that breach rules against alcohol consumption and the mixing of unrelated men and women. Those attending can be detained and fined or sentenced to corporal punishment in the form of lashes.

Women do not enjoy equal rights in divorce and child custody disputes. In 2019, the Guardian Council approved a legal amendment that would enable Iranian women married to foreign men to request Iranian citizenship for their children. The first identification cards for such children were issued in 2021.

Iranians can receive an abortion within the first four months of a pregnancy if three doctors decide that the mother's life is at risk or if the fetus shows signs of severe disability. In 2021 the Guardian Council ratified the Youthful Population and Protection of the Family Law, which strengthened enforcement of abortion restrictions and established a committee that includes judicial representatives, Islamic jurists, doctors, and legislators to develop new regulations. The law also bans voluntary sterilization and the distribution of free contraceptives.

The government provides no protection to women and children forced into sex trafficking, and both Iranians and migrant workers from countries like Afghanistan are subject to forced labor and debt bondage. The IRGC has allegedly used coercive tactics to recruit thousands of Afghan migrants living in Iran to fight in Syria. Human Rights Watch has reported that children as young as 14 are among those recruited.

The population faces widespread economic hardship driven by a combination of US-led trade sanctions and mismanagement by the regime. The crisis has resulted in the rapid devaluation of the national currency and soaring prices for basic goods. In September 2022, Alena Douhan, the UN special rapporteur on the negative impact of the unilateral coercive measures, said in a report that sanctions on Iran affected most aspects of life in the country, and she called for them to be lifted.

Iraq

Population: 40,220,000
Capital: Baghdad
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Iraq holds regular, competitive elections, and the country's various partisan, religious, and ethnic groups generally enjoy representation in the political system. However, democratic governance is impeded in practice by corruption, militias operating outside the bounds of the law, and the weakness of formal institutions. In the Kurdistan region, democratic institutions lack the strength to contain the influence of the two ruling parties, each maintaining its own internal security forces, ready to repress dissidents and peaceful protesters. Increasingly, Iran has been able to influence politics in Baghdad. State officials and powerful militias routinely infringe upon the rights of citizens through legal and extrajudicial means.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, 73 legislators from the Sadrist Movement, who were all followers of Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, resigned in protest of opposition parties' failure to join them in creating a coalition government. The parliament swore in 64 new members, all of whom were runners-up in their districts in the 2021 elections, leaving 9 seats vacant. The new parliamentarians' presence significantly increased the share of pro-Iran lawmakers.
- In August, protests in Baghdad led by supporters of al-Sadr turned into violent clashes with pro-Iran militias that resulted in the deaths of 22 people. Al-Sadr called for his supporters to disperse, which paved the way for the formation of a government in October. The resignation of the 73 lawmakers allowed for Prime Minister Muhammad Shia al-Sudani and his government, supported by the pro-Iranian Coordination Framework, to be approved by Parliament in October. The Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP)–aligned candidate, Abdul Latif Rashid, was elected president the same month.
- Starting in late September, the Iranian regime began carrying out and officially claiming responsibility for a repeated waves of drone and missile strikes that killed dozens of people, including many civilians, across the Iraqi Kurdistan region. Tensions between Iran and the United States continued to play out on Iraqi soil, endangering Iraqi citizens and Iranian exiles, particularly in Kurdistan.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 16 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 8 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

After national elections, the Council of Representatives (CoR) chooses the largely ceremonial president, traditionally Kurdish, who in turn appoints a prime minister, traditionally Shia, nominated by the largest bloc in the parliament. The prime minister, who holds most executive power and forms the government, serves up to two four-year terms.

In October 2022, after a year-long political paralysis, Prime Minister Muhammad Shia al-Sudani and his government, supported by the pro-Iran Coordination Framework, were approved by the parliament. Earlier that month, the KDP–aligned candidate, Abdul Latif Rashid, was elected as president.

The Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG), composed of Iraq's northernmost provinces, is ostensibly led by a president with extensive executive powers, but former long-term KRG president, Masoud Barzani, maintains significant political influence. In 2019, Nechirvan Barzani, Masoud's brother, was elected president by the Iraqi Kurdish parliament after the position had been vacant for nearly two years. Masrour Barzani, Masoud's son, was appointed and sworn in as prime minister the same month. Both Barzanis, the current president and prime minister, are members of the KDP.

The 329 members of the CoR are elected every four years from multimember open lists in each province. The October 2021 parliamentary elections were generally viewed as credible by international observers, despite documented cases of voter and candidate intimidation, bribing of voters, journalists being prevented from covering the voting, arrests of activists calling for an election boycott, and the lowest voter turnout since the end of the Saddam Hussein regime.

In June 2022, following the resignation of the 73 Sadrist parliamentarians at the order of al-Sadr, the CoR swore in 64 new parliamentarians, leaving nine seats vacant. The new parliamentarians were the runners-up in their districts in the 2021 elections and gave the pro-Iranian bloc, the Coordination Framework, 40 more seats, for a total of 130. The opposition parties affiliated with the 2019 protest movement, Imtidad and Ishraqat Kanoon, gained 7 and 1 seats respectively.

In August 2022, protests in Baghdad led by Sadrists in response to the 10-month political crisis turned into violent clashes with pro-Iran militias that resulted in the deaths of 22 people. Thereafter, al-Sadr called for his supporters to disperse, which paved the way for the formation of a government in October.

In Iraqi Kurdistan, the 111-seat Kurdish parliament is elected through closed party-list proportional representation in a single district, with members serving four-year terms. Since the 2018 elections, the governing KDP has maintained a plurality of seats, followed by the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) and the Gorran movement. The elections were plagued by fraud allegations and other irregularities, and Gorran and other smaller parties rejected the results. Political disputes between the KDP and PUK concerning the formation of the electoral committee led to the cancelation of the October 2022 Kurdish parliamentary elections; no subsequent date had been set as of year-end.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Independent High Electoral Commission (IHEC) is responsible for managing elections. The IHEC generally enjoys the confidence of the international community and, according to some polls, the Iraqi public.

The October 2021 elections were the first held under a new system dividing Iraq into 83 multimember electoral districts, created to appease Tishreen movement protesters and facilitate the entry of independent candidates into Parliament.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

The constitution guarantees the freedom to form and join political parties, with the exception of the pre-2003 dictatorship's Baath Party, whose participation, ideas, and protest activity are banned and criminalized. Further, any groups that support racism, terrorism, sectarianism, sectarian cleansing, and other ideas contrary to democracy or the peaceful transfer of power are also banned. Individual Iraqis' freedom to run for office is also limited by a vague "good conduct" requirement in the electoral law.

In practice, Iraqis can generally form parties and operate without government interference, and parties explicitly opposing the current sectarian apportionment political system are allowed to operate, although prominent members face intimidation from militias. Women politicians have also faced threats from conservative elements in society. Party membership and multiparty alliances shift frequently.

Elections are competitive, but all major parties are dominated by one sectarian or ethnic group. Sectarian parties are expected to continue leading the formation of a new government.

However, several new more secular and nationalist parties participated in the 2021 elections, and two parties linked to the 2019 Tishreen protest movement won 14 seats, even as its candidates and activists faced threats. Despite its military force and loyal personnel, the Coordination Framework lost significant representation in 2021, demonstrating the ability of Iraqi voters to affect Parliament's makeup, even if they cannot shift the balance of armed power in the country. However, the resignation of Sadrist lawmakers in June 2022 again shifted the balance of power in Parliament in favor of the Coordination Framework.

In 2022, KRG authorities continued their repression of the activities of the New Generation party and its affiliated media outlet, Nalia Radio and Television (NRT), owned by New Generation party leader Shaswar Abdulwahid.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Iraq's political system remains distorted by interference from foreign powers, most notably Iran; Iranian authorities physically and politically threaten or buy the support of Iraqi policymakers. The governing Coordination Framework represents Iran-backed militias that do not follow the official command structure of Iraq's armed forces and, alongside Saraya al-Salam, engage in violent intimidation of political opponents, at times resorting to kidnapping and murder.

In July 2022, following the resignation of 73 Sadrist lawmakers, Sadrist supporters prevented the functioning of the Iraqi Parliament in Baghdad for several months by staging prolonged protests. After the protests turned into violent clashes with pro-Iran militias that resulted in the deaths of 22 people in August, the standoff ended, clearing the way for the October formation of a Coordination Framework–backed government.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Despite legal and constitutional measures designed to protect the political rights of various religious and ethnic groups, the dominant role of ethno-sectarian parties and the allocation of key offices according to informal religious or ethnic criteria reduce the likelihood that politicians will act in the interests of the whole population.

A system of reserved seats ensures a minimum representation in the CoR for some of Iraq's smaller religious and ethnic minorities. There are five seats reserved for Christians and one each for Fayli Kurds, Yazidis, Sabean Mandaeans, and Shabaks. The Kurdish parliament reserves five seats for Turkmen, five for Christians, and one for Armenians. The political rights of minority groups have been severely impeded by widespread displacement from areas formerly occupied by the Islamic State (IS) militant group.

The CoR and the Kurdish parliament reserve 25 percent and 30 percent of their seats for women, respectively, though such formal representation has had little obvious effect on state policies toward women, who are typically excluded from political debates and leadership positions. LGBT+ people are unable to enjoy equal political rights in practice due to harsh societal discrimination. Prominent politicians and clerics, including al-Sadr, have incited violence against LGBT+ people, contributing to their persecution by security services and militias.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Low institutional capacity, widespread corruption, and extensive Iranian influence, among other issues, have hindered elected officials' ability to independently set and implement laws. The turn to street politics and violence by contending Shia blocs has paralyzed the functioning of the Iraqi parliament and prolonged the reign of the unelected caretaker government following the 2021 elections; a government formed in October 2022.

Iran-backed militias, incorporated under the Popular Mobilization Forces (PMF), are officially part of Iraqi state institutions but in practice set their own policies and undermine the government's ability to set its own agendas. They planned the assassination attempt of then prime minister Mustafa al-Kadhimi in November 2021, repressed political protests, kidnapped and assassinated activists, and attacked US targets in Iraq. The United States and its allies also exert some policy influence through their support for Iraqi Security Forces and other state institutions.

In the Kurdistan region, although elected KRG representatives have jurisdiction, in practice, the region is split between the Erbil and Dohuk governorates, under KDP control, and Sulaymaniyah, controlled by the PUK. Each region has its own politically affiliated internal security (Asayish) and military forces (Peshmerga).

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption remains a major problem in Iraq and was a key contributor to the 2019 Tishreen protest movement. Political parties siphon funds from the ministries they control, take kickbacks for government contracts, monopolize specific sectors of the economy, and resist anticorruption efforts. The judicial system, itself hampered by politicization and corruption, acts on only a fraction of the cases investigated by the Integrity Commission, one of three anticorruption bodies.

Under both the federal government and the KRG, whistleblowers, investigators, journalists, and private individuals raising corruption concerns have faced arrests, charges of defamation, violence, intimidation, and slander.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The government does not operate with transparency, despite a few official policies promoting openness, including an asset disclosure requirement. The CoR debates the budget, and interest groups are often able to access draft legislation. Government spending, in both Baghdad and the KRG, is not transparent. The PMF's large budget is particularly opaque. The number of fighters drawing salaries is unknown and likely significantly larger than the actual number of active soldiers. The public procurement system is not transparent and is corrupt, with no legal recourse available for unsuccessful bidders. The oil and gas industry also lacks transparency, and the government has failed to make adequate progress in meeting its commitments to the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative. There is no comprehensive law on public access to information.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? −1 / 0

IS's loss of territorial control in 2017 largely halted its campaign to alter religious demography. However, as of October 2022, nearly 1.2 million people displaced by IS remain unable to return to their homes, either for security and economic reasons, or because their original communities reject their return or authorities prohibit it. Kurdish authorities encouraged local and substate forces to prevent Arab families displaced by the IS conflict from returning to villages near the Syria-Iraq border and in disputed areas under de facto KRG control, in an apparent attempt to change the region's demography. Displaced families with perceived links to IS who continue to reside in and outside of camps are particularly vulnerable to assault and sexual abuse.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 13 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Iraq's media environment appears lively and diverse, but there are few politically independent news sources. In recent years, social media has been utilized to spread fake news and explicit threats against activists, particularly by Iran-backed militias. Media outlets face restrictions and obstruction in response to their coverage.

The Iraqi authorities have assaulted, detained, or arrested journalists for their work, at times charging them with defamation and insulting public institutions. Militias shoot, kidnap, torture, and assassinate reporters for their work, and supporters of political parties and militias occasionally attack journalists. In May 2022, Iraqi journalist Ali al-Dhabhawi was arrested in Baghdad, after he criticized Iraqi militias on his television program Studio 9.

As of April 2022, three journalists were serving prison sentences for conducting their work, convicted by the KRG authorities. KRG authorities routinely beat, harass, and arbitrarily arrest, detain, and sentence journalists without due process. While local journalists bear most of the brunt of repression by Iraqi and Kurdish authorities, occasionally foreign journalists are hindered from doing their work as well. Throughout 2022, several journalists and news websites that have published on corruption in Iraqi Kurdistan were targeted by cyberattacks.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of belief, but in practice many Iraqis experience violence and displacement due to their religious identity. The Baha'i community continues to suffer from legal discrimination, as its religious activity continues to be banned, and Baha'is are not recognized as members of a minority religion, preventing them from registering themselves. Since Baha'i marriages are unregistered, children born to such marriages effectively become stateless.

Blasphemy laws remain in the legal code, although enforcement is rare. Children with one Muslim parent, including converts, are automatically designated as Muslim. Conversion from Islam to another religion is banned by law. Atheists largely hide their lack of religious belief due to societal stigma and persecution.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Educators have long faced the threat of violence or other repercussions for teaching subjects or discussing topics that powerful state or nonstate actors find objectionable. The country's official curriculum is often augmented in the classroom by religious or sectarian viewpoints. Political activism by university students can result in harassment or intimidation.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Commentary on controversial topics, including on social media, are considered to be off limits and at times prompt arrest, docking of salaries, torture, and criminal lawsuits. Social media users and bloggers have faced defamation suits from government officials for criticizing corruption and misgovernance. Authorities have released video footage of detainees to humiliate and intimidate them.

Activists across Iraq and Iraqi Kurdistan describe a climate of fear that has led them to self-censor. Authorities arrest individuals, some of them ordinary citizens with no background in activism, shortly after they post messages critical of authorities on social media, including the app Clubhouse, indicating that Iraqi and Kurdish authorities are constantly monitoring online platforms. In December 2022, in a landmark case, a Baghdad court sentenced Haidar al-Zaidi to three years in prison for a post on Twitter criticizing the former head of PMF. "Electronic armies" working on behalf of powerful actors across Iraq have also abused systems of reporting on platforms such as Facebook and Twitter to remove the pages or suspend private profiles of critics.

However, surveillance is not restricted to social media. Over the past year, Kurdish authorities have arrested and dismissed mosque preachers for their criticism of the ruling regime and absence of basic services. Over 30 private citizens involved in the 2019 Tishreen protest movement, including at least one minor, were abducted between 2019 to 2021; their whereabouts remained unknown as of December 2022.

In May 2022, the Iraqi parliament passed a law prohibiting normalization with Israel, which also criminalized any speech, including on social media, advocating such normalization.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but protesters are frequently at risk of violence or arrest. These dangers have become acute during the ongoing Tishreen protest movement against corruption, poor infrastructure and government services, and high unemployment. Security forces have used curfews, tear gas, and live ammunition to suppress demonstrations in Baghdad and other southern cities. Hundreds of people had been killed in retaliation for their protest activities during 2022; of them, dozens were killed in targeted assassinations outside of protest squares. Iraqi security forces routinely beat, shot, arrested, and tortured protesters.

Militiamen kidnap activists, torture them for several days, and then release them to coerce them to cease their antiregime activity. Iranian media and media outlets linked to Iran-backed militias spread false reports about activists to justify their targeting and issued explicit threats to activists and critics set to be targeted next.

Following 2020, the number of protests in the Kurdistan region dropped significantly, which local activists claim was the result of security forces' use of unprecedented levels of violence against protesters. In 2022, Kurdish authorities linked both to the KDP and the PUK continued to prevent protesters from gathering and attacked and arrested peaceful protesters and journalists covering the protests, regardless of the demonstration's message.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) enjoy societal support and a relatively hospitable regulatory environment, though they must register with the government and obtain approval from the commission responsible for suppressing Baathism. For international NGOs, registration is cumbersome and often requires payment of bribes. In Kurdistan, registration of NGOs is straightforward, but NGOs must renew their registration annually.

Militias have threatened, assaulted, kidnapped, tortured, raped in captivity, assassinated, and planted explosive devices at the homes of multiple critics and activists (and their family members), particularly those involved in the Tishreen protest movement. Ali Akram al-Bayati, a prominent human rights defender and former member of Iraq's national human rights body the Iraqi High Commission for Human Rights (IHCHR), was abducted in February 2022 for supposedly defaming the Anti-Corruption Committee during an interview in late 2020. The targeting of a former IHCHR member, who enjoyed immunity for the duration of his term, may intimidate current and future members from investigating human rights abuses.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Labor laws allow for collective bargaining (even by nonunionized workers), protect the rights of subcontractors and migrant workers, and permit workers to strike, among other rights. However, public sector workers are not allowed to unionize, there is no legal prohibition against antiunion discrimination, and workers do not have access to legal remedies if fired for union activity. Some state officials and private employers discourage union activity with threats, demotions, and other deterrents.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary in Arab-majority Iraq and Iraqi Kurdistan is influenced by corruption, political pressure, violent intimidation and occasional killings, tribal forces, and religious interests. The lines between the executive, legislative, and judicial branches are frequently blurred, and executive interference in the judiciary is widespread. Many Iraqis turn to tribal bodies to settle disputes, even those involving major crimes.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Criminal proceedings in Iraq are deeply flawed. Arbitrary arrests, including arrests without a warrant, are common. Detainees are frequently denied access to lawyers, who when available are often prevented access to crucial public documents. Terrorism cases have been prone to fundamental violations of due process, with human rights groups describing systematic denial of access to counsel and short, summary trials with little evidence that the defendants, who are often allegedly associated with IS, have committed specific crimes.

Repeated promises to investigate and prosecute members of Iran-backed militias responsible for a wave of assassinations, assassination attempts, and kidnappings of activists across southern Iraq have largely not been upheld by political leaders. Several named suspects are protected by political parties, and the overwhelming majority of cases remain unsolved. Efforts to locate victims of kidnappings have not successfully obtained the release of those who have disappeared.

The end of large-scale combat with IS significantly improved the security environment in Iraq. Though the organization remained active as a clandestine terrorist group in 2020, it no longer controlled Iraqi territory or civilian populations, and its ability to operate was diminished. Throughout 2021, IS waged an insurgency in rural areas of western and northern Iraq, targeting both civilians and military personnel. The insurgency and the collective punishment policies adopted by the Iraqi Security Forces in response have threatened the physical safety of residents.

Militias have recaptured large swaths of Iraqi territory from IS, but they have also engaged in war crimes such as pillaging, forcible displacement of Sunnis, kidnappings, and torture. Over 600 Sunni men and boys who were kidnapped by the PMF during the recapture of western provinces of Iraq in 2016 have not been heard from since.

Turkish military forces have carried out drone strikes, artillery shelling and ground incursions into Iraqi Kurdistan to combat the Kurdistan Workers' Union (PKK) guerilla group. Data released in 2022 shows that since 2015, the Turkish military has killed at least 98 civilians. Others, including Yazidi civilians, have been displaced en masse in the Kurdistan-Turkey border region.

Tensions between Iran and the United States continued to play out on Iraqi soil in 2022, endangering Iraqi citizens and Iranian exiles, particularly in Kurdistan. Starting in late September 2022, the Iranian regime began carrying out and officially claiming responsibility for repeated waves of drone and missile strikes that killed dozens of people, including many civilians, across the Iraqi Kurdistan region.

The use of torture to obtain confessions is widespread across Iraq and Iraqi Kurdistan, including that of children, and even in death penalty cases. Detainees are often held in harsh, overcrowded conditions, and forced disappearances, particularly of suspected IS fighters, have been reported.

Women face widespread societal bias and discriminatory legal treatment under the law. Sexual harassment in the workplace is prohibited, but victims rarely pursue formal complaints. Same-sex relations are not explicitly prohibited, but people risk violence if they are perceived as members of the LGBT+ community. Police forces, militias, and the family members of LGBT+ people have murdered, kidnapped, tortured, raped, confined, and abused LGBT+ Iraqis in recent years. The state and nonstate perpetrators of such violence have enjoyed impunity, which has rendered reporting such abuse to the authorities futile or even dangerous.

Members of a given ethnic or religious group tend to suffer discrimination or persecution in areas where they represent a minority, leading many to seek safety in other neighborhoods or provinces. People of African descent suffer from high rates of extreme poverty and discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement has improved somewhat as areas formerly controlled by IS were brought back under government control. However, large-scale destruction of housing and infrastructure, the presence of sectarian or partisan militias, and the ongoing threat of violence has made it difficult for many displaced people to return home. The renewed IS insurgency and the Iraqi Security Forces' corresponding response, as well as fighting between the Turkish military and the PKK in northern Iraq have constrained the freedom of movement of residents in rural western and northern Iraq.

The KRG also continues to prevent Arab families from returning to villages on the border with Syria, from which they fled during fighting between the Peshmerga and IS in 2014.

The movement of women is limited by legal restrictions. Women require the consent of a male guardian to obtain a passport and the Civil Status Identification Document, which is needed to access employment, education, and many social services.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Iraqis are legally free to own property and establish businesses, but observance of property rights has been limited by corruption and conflict. Families perceived to be affiliated with IS living in displacement are particularly vulnerable to confiscation or takeover of their property. Business owners face demands for bribes, threats, and violent attempts to seize their enterprises. Contracts are difficult to enforce. Women are legally disadvantaged with respect to inheritance rights and may face pressure to yield their rights to male relatives.

In Baghdad's middle- and upper-class neighborhoods, such as Jadriya and Karrada, pro-Iranian militias have used threats and violent intimidation to force owners of large homes to give up their property, expanding a practice previously employed against Sunnis and Christians in the capital. In Iraqi Kurdistan, the recent construction boom has sometimes come at the expense of local landowners and farmers, whose fields are confiscated without notice or compensation.

Forced and early marriages are common, especially in the context of displacement and poverty. Over one in four Iraqi women aged 20 to 24 were married by age 18, and marriage for those aged 15 is legal with parental approval. Laws on marriage and divorce favor men over women. No law banning domestic violence exists, and Iraqi husbands are allowed to "punish" their wives and children. Iraqi women's rights organizations' efforts to compel Parliament to pass a law banning gender-based violence have been unsuccessful.

Rapists can avoid prosecution if they marry their victims; spousal rape is not prohibited. The law also allows reduced sentences for those convicted of so-called honor killings, which are seldom punished in practice. These types of crimes typically involve a male relative targeting a woman (sister or wife) or an LGBT+ person.

Both men and women face pressure to conform to conservative standards on personal appearance and face harassment, detention, and abuse by state actors and relatives for diverging from traditional appearance or mannerisms that match their biological sex.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

As of 2022, over 2,700 Yazidi women and children who had been kidnapped by IS during the 2014 genocide of Yazidi people remain missing. Many of them were likely forced into sexual slavery or forced labor. Exploitation of children, including through forced begging and the recruitment of child soldiers by militias, is an ongoing problem. Foreign migrant workers frequently work long hours for low pay and are vulnerable to forced labor. According to the US State Department's 2022 Trafficking in Persons report, human trafficking continues unabated throughout Iraq—at times with the protection of corrupt officials—and internally displaced persons, refugees, migrant workers, and LGBT+ people are particularly vulnerable.

A study published in 2022 by the International Labor Organization shows that almost 55 percent of total employment in Iraq is in the informal sector, where employees have limited protections, benefits, and work stability.

Ireland

Population: 5,100,000
Capital: Dublin
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Ireland is a stable democracy in which political rights and civil liberties are respected and defended. There is some limited societal discrimination, especially against the traditionally nomadic Irish Travellers. Corruption scandals have plagued the police force, and domestic violence remains a problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- The Electoral Reform Bill, which will establish Ireland's first independent Electoral Commission, became law in July.
- A government action plan to tackle corruption within Ireland's police force, An Garda Síochána, was published in September.
- The January murder of Ashling Murphy led to urgent calls to address violence against women.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Taoiseach, or prime minister, is nominated by the House of Representatives (Dáil Éireann) and formally appointed by the president. Thus, the legitimacy of the prime minister is largely dependent on the conduct of Dáil elections, which historically have been free and fair. As agreed in the 2020 Programme for Government by the parties in the governing coalition—Fianna Fáil, Fine Gael, and the Green Party—Leo Varadkar of Fine Gael took over as Taoiseach from Micheál Martin of Fianna Fáil in December 2022.

The president is elected to up to two seven-year terms, and as chief of state has mostly ceremonial duties. Michael D. Higgins was reelected in 2018. Voting in presidential elections has historically been free and fair.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Dáil's 160 members are elected in multimember districts through a proportional representation system, and their terms last five years. The Senate (Seanad Éireann) contains 60 seats; 43 members are indirectly chosen through an electoral college, while 11 are selected by the Taoiseach and 6 are selected from constituencies that represent some higher education institutions.

The February 2020 Dáil election saw no major irregularities or unequal campaigning. Sinn Féin won 37 seats (24.5 percent), its best result ever, and Fianna Fáil won 38 seats (22.2 percent). Fine Gael won 35 seats (20.9 percent), and the Green Party 12 (7.1 percent).

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Ireland's electoral framework is strong and government bodies hold credible polls. In July 2022, the government enacted the Electoral Reform Bill 2022, which establishes an independent Electoral Commission. The law also contains new measures to improve voter registration mechanisms, regulate online political advertising, and strengthen regulations around political donations.

Ireland frequently holds referendums, especially on European Union (EU) treaties.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties in Ireland are free to form and compete. Among the main parties, Fianna Fáil and Fine Gael do not differ widely in ideology, despite their long history as rivals; they represent the successors of opposing sides in the nation's 1922–23 civil war. Other key parties include Sinn Féin—a left-wing republican party that leads the opposition—the Labour Party, and the Green Party.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties generally do not encounter restrictions or harassment that affects their ability to gain power through elections, and most of the main parties have been part of government at some point in the history of the state.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination by the military, foreign powers, religious hierarchies, and other powerful groups.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Women are underrepresented, holding 23.1 percent of the Dáil's seats. Women are visible in electoral politics, however, with Sinn Féin and the Social Democrats both having female leaders.

Taoiseach Varadkar is gay and the son of an Indian immigrant.

While ethnic minority and marginalized groups are generally free to participate in politics, Irish Travellers and Roma have little representation. Travellers were formally recognized as an Indigenous ethnic group in 2017, the same year a National Traveller and Roma Inclusion Strategy (NTRIS) was launched. A review of the NTRIS was due in 2021 but remained uncompleted at the end of 2022.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials freely determine government policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Ireland has a recent history of problems with political corruption but has introduced anticorruption legislation in recent years. The Criminal Justice (Corruption Offences) Act 2018 modernized and consolidated existing anticorruption laws, though critics claimed that the legislation did not adequately address bribery.

Scandals involving An Garda Síochána have raised concerns about a lack of safeguards against police corruption. In September 2022, in conjunction with the Justice Department, An Garda Síochána published an action plan to tackle corruption in the police force, building on work done by the Garda Anti-Corruption Unit.

A new law protecting whistleblowers, the Protected Disclosures (Amendment) Act 2022 was enacted in July 2022.

A multiagency review group examining anticorruption and antifraud structures was established after the government completed a 2017 study of white-collar crime. In April 2021, the Justice Department published an implementation plan based on the group's recommendations, which included the establishment of an anticorruption advisory council.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The public has broad access to official information under the 2014 Freedom of Information (FOI) Act, though partial exemptions remain for the police and some other agencies. A Transparency Code requires open records on the groups and individuals that advise public officials on policy. A comprehensive review of FOI legislation is ongoing.

In June 2022, the government enacted the Birth Information and Tracing Act 2022, which provides survivors and their relatives with access to birth and other records of people who lived in abusive, Church-run "Mother and Baby Homes" during the 20th century.

The government has been criticized for failing to consult meaningfully with civil society groups and relevant stakeholders in policy formulation, particularly regarding the Roma, Travellers, and people living with disabilities.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 58 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Irish media are free and independent, and present a variety of viewpoints. However, the media sector is highly concentrated, with one company—Independent News and Media—controlling much of the newspaper market.

Ireland's restrictive defamation laws continue to receive criticism. In March 2022, the Justice Minister received government approval to reform the Defamation Act 2009; an amendment bill was in preparation late in the year. Sinn Féin has been accused by rival parties of the strategic use of defamation cases against broadcast outlets to quash negative press, and in May 2022, the Index on Censorship issued a media freedom alert with the Council of Europe (CoE) regarding one such case.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed. Although religious oaths are still required from senior public officials, there is no state religion, and adherents of other faiths face few impediments to religious expression. In recent years, the Roman Catholic Church has notably declined in the public eye, following a series of sexual abuse and other scandals involving the Church and its clergy.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected. The Roman Catholic Church operates approximately 90 percent of Ireland's schools, most of which include religious education from which parents may exempt their children. The constitution requires equal funding for schools run by different denominations.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant impediments to open and free private discussion, including in personal online communications. However, Ireland's national identity card, the Public Services Card (PSC), has elicited controversy due to data storage and privacy concerns. In December 2021, the government acceded to a finding by the Irish Data Protection Commission that the PSC could not be made a mandatory requirement for accessing services. The government also agreed to make changes to the way it processes card data.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The right to assemble freely is respected, and peaceful demonstrations are held each year.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is upheld, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) can operate freely.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Labor unions operate without hindrance, and collective bargaining is legal and unrestricted.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Ireland has a generally independent judiciary and a legal system based on common law. The Judicial Council, a body which promotes judicial excellence, good conduct, and judicial independence, began operating in 2020 and adopted judicial conduct and ethics guidelines in February 2022.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Due process generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. However, the police force has been affected by repeated corruption scandals in recent years.

A Special Criminal Court (SCC) has functioned since 1972 to hear cases related to paramilitary violence committed during the period of sectarian conflict in Northern Ireland known as the Troubles. The Irish Council for Civil Liberties (ICCL) has called for the SCC's abolition, noting that it does not employ a jury and can consider secret evidence, as has the Irish Human Rights and Equality Commission (IHREC).

Irish prisons and detention facilities are frequently dangerous, unsanitary, overcrowded, and ill-equipped for prisoners with mental illness. In its most recent annual report, published in September 2022, the Office of the Inspector of Prisons reported that COVID-19-related periods of isolation negatively affected prisoners via a lack of family contact and limited access to rehabilitation and educational services. A prisoner died in August 2022 following an attack by a group of inmates at Dublin's Mountjoy Prison. The killing was investigated by the Irish Prison Service and An Garda Síochána, and in November four prisoners were arrested in the case.

A series of official inquiries in recent years have detailed decades of past physical, sexual, and emotional abuse—including forced labor—of women and children in state institutions and by Catholic priests and nuns from the early 20th century until 1996, as well as collusion to hide the abuse. The Commission of Investigation into Mother and Baby Homes reported "appalling level[s] of infant mortality" and discrimination against residents when it published its final report in January 2021. Then Taoiseach Martin offered an official apology that month. An €800-million ($950-million) redress scheme for survivors was announced in November 2021, but 24,000 survivors who spent less than six months in homes or were "boarded out" were excluded. In 2022, both the Children's Committee of the Oireachtas (Irish parliament) and the UN Human Rights Committee called on the government to remove this exemption.

While existing legislation bans hate speech, Ireland lacks comprehensive hate-crime laws, and NGOs have criticized existing laws as dated and ineffective. The government proposed much-anticipated legislation in April 2021, which was working its way through parliament at the end of 2022.

Supranational bodies have criticized ethnic discrimination within Ireland. In 2020, the EU Agency for Fundamental Rights reported that two-thirds of Irish Travellers and Roma face discrimination. The CoE called a 2017–21 inclusion strategy for both groups ineffective in a 2019 report. A 2020 survey of Gardaí (police officers) revealed that not a single respondent had a favorable view of the Traveller community. Another study released in June 2022 alleged institutional racism against Travellers within the force.

A new action plan to widen Traveller and Roma participation in higher education was announced in 2022, with the detailed plan published in August. In July 2022, the UN Human Rights Committee urged the government to develop further specific action plans on Traveller and Roma mental health, employment, and enterprise.

People with disabilities face housing issues, are persistently institutionalized, and have suffered a severe reduction of social benefits in recent years. The 2021 Annual Report from the IHREC, released in July 2022, showed that the most common reason that people contacted the commission related to services and employment was to raise concerns about disability discrimination.

Irish law prohibits discrimination based on sexual orientation, but some social stigma against LGBT+ people persists. Several alleged hate crimes against members of the LGBT+ community took place in 2022. They included the murders of two men in their Sligo homes in separate incidents in April 2022, and an apparent homophobic assault on a man in Dublin the same month.

The asylum application process is complex, and asylum seekers can be housed for lengthy periods in poor living conditions in a system known as Direct Provision. In February 2021, the government published a white paper on replacing Direct Provision with a new model by the end of 2023.

The 2015 International Protection Law expedites asylum procedures but focuses on enabling deportations rather than identifying and processing cases. In a July 2021 report, the Irish Refugee Council highlighted extensive delays for protection-process applicants.

Discrimination in the workplace on the basis of gender is illegal, though there is still a substantial gender pay gap.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are ordinarily no restrictions on travel or the ability to change one's place of residence, employment, or education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Private businesses are free to operate, and property rights are generally respected.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Individuals in Ireland have gained expanded social freedoms in recent years. In a 2015 referendum, voters extended marriage rights to same-sex couples. That same year, the Children and Family Relationships Act extended adoption rights to same-sex and cohabiting heterosexual couples, and the Gender Recognition Act allowed transgender individuals to obtain legal recognition without medical or state intervention, and—for married transgender people—without divorcing. In a 2018 referendum, voters abolished a constitutional amendment that made nearly all abortions illegal, and health providers began performing abortions in 2019.

In 2019, Ireland enacted the Domestic Violence Act 2018, which criminalized forms of emotional and psychological abuse. However, domestic and sexual violence against women remain serious problems, and marginalized and immigrant women have particular difficulty accessing support. In January 2022, the killing of 23-year-old teacher and musician Ashling Murphy while she was jogging outside in Tullamore led to widespread condemnation of violence against women in Ireland. According to Safe Ireland, a women and children's advocacy group, 11 more women were murdered in Ireland over the course of the year. Justice Minister Helen McEntee in August 2022 announced that new antistalking legislation as well as other measures addressing gender-based violence would be introduced and enacted before the end of the year, but they were still before the Dáil at year's end.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

People generally enjoy equality of opportunity. Workers have rights and protections under employment legislation. Although the government works to combat human trafficking and protect victims, undocumented migrant workers remain at risk of trafficking and labor exploitation.

Israel

Population: 9,500,000
Capital: Jerusalem
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in the Gaza Strip or the West Bank, which are examined in separate reports. Although the international community generally considers East Jerusalem to be part of the occupied West Bank, it may be mentioned in this report when specific conditions there directly affect or overlap with conditions in Israel proper. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed or occupied territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology.

Overview: Israel is a parliamentary democracy with a multiparty system and independent institutions that guarantee political rights and civil liberties for most of the population. Although the judiciary is comparatively active in protecting minority rights, the political leadership and many in society have discriminated against Arab and other ethnic or religious minority populations, resulting in systemic disparities in areas including infrastructure, criminal justice, education, and economic opportunity.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, one year after forming a government, the coalition led by then prime minister Naftali Bennett and Yair Lapid collapsed. Bennett stepped down and the Knesset was dissolved later the same month.
- Snap legislative elections were held in November, marking Israel's fifth parliamentary elections since 2019. The right-wing nationalist electoral bloc headed by former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu took a plurality of seats in the elections, allowing Netanyahu to form a coalition government in December composed of his Likud party, the far-right Religious Zionist party, and two ultra-Orthodox parties, Shas and United Torah Judaism.
- The new coalition government presented its platform to the Knesset in December, which included a declaration that "the Jewish people have an exclusive and indisputable right to all parts of the Land of Israel." This designation was commonly understood to include the occupied West Bank.
- The trial against Netanyahu, who faces numerous corruption charges, including bribery and fraud, continued throughout the year. Netanyahu's new government, formed in December, is expected to pursue legislative approval of an immunity bill that would shield him and other lawmakers from prosecution while in office.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

A largely ceremonial president is elected by the Knesset (parliament) for one seven-year term. In June 2021, Isaac Herzog, formerly the head of the Labor Party, was elected to replace outgoing president Reuven Rivlin.

The prime minister must have the support of a majority in the Knesset. In 2014, in a bid to create more stable governing coalitions, the electoral threshold for parties to win representation was raised from 2 percent to 3.25 percent, and the no-confidence procedure was revised so that opponents hoping to oust a sitting government must simultaneously vote in a new one. Despite this change, there are still many small parties in the political system, making it difficult to form majorities.

After the March 2021 elections, parties from across the political spectrum formed a new coalition government, ending the premiership of Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu. According to the coalition agreement, Naftali Bennett of the right-wing Yamina Party would serve as prime minister for about two years, after which Yair Lapid of the centrist Yesh Atid would replace him until the next elections. In June 2022, Bennett and Lapid announced that their governing coalition had collapsed and the Knesset would be dissolved; Lapid was appointed interim prime minister until a new government could be formed following snap elections in November. Netanyahu returned as prime minster in December as head of the most right-wing government in Israeli history after successfully forming a new governing coalition. Observers have described the new coalition government as "ultranationalist."

Members of the 120-seat Knesset are elected to serve four-year terms through closed-list proportional representation using a single nationwide district, and elections are typically free and fair.

The November 2022 elections saw the weakest performance of the Israeli left in the country's history. The right-wing nationalist bloc headed by Netanyahu was able to secure a plurality of seats following the elections: Netanyahu's Likud took 32 seats, while the far-right Religious Zionist party took 14 seats, and ultra-Orthodox parties Shas and United Torah Judaism took 11 and 7 seats, respectively. Yesh Atid took 24 seats, the centrist National Unity won 12, Israel is our Home won 6, the Islamist Ra'am and the Arab-led Joint List won 5 seats each, and the center-left Labor Party won 4. The left-wing Meretz failed to cross the electoral threshold for the first time in Israel's history.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The Central Elections Committee (CEC), is responsible for ensuring the fairness of elections. It is composed of delegations representing the various political groups in the Knesset, supported by a professional staff, and chaired by a Supreme Court judge. Elections are generally conducted in a peaceful and orderly manner, and all parties usually accept the results. The conduct of the 2022 elections was generally perceived as fair and successful.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

Israel hosts a diverse and competitive multiparty system. However, parties or candidates that deny Israel's Jewish character, oppose democracy, or incite racism are prohibited. This has occasionally been invoked against both far-right Jewish candidates and Arab candidates. After agreeing to join the coalition government in December 2022, the far-right Religious Zionist party announced plans to pursue legal amendments that would remove the prohibition on "racial incitement" in the Knesset.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Israel has undergone multiple, peaceful rotations of power among rival political groups during its history, and the 2022 elections resulted in the replacement of the incumbent prime minister. Opposition parties have typically controlled many local governments, and Arab-majority towns are mostly run by independents or mayors from the Joint List.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Israeli voters are generally free from coercion or undue influence by interest groups outside the political sphere. Political parties rely mostly on public subsidies for their financing.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Political rights are unevenly upheld.

Women generally enjoy full political rights in law and in practice, though they remain underrepresented in leadership positions and can encounter additional obstacles in parties and communities—both Jewish and Arab—that are associated with religious or cultural conservatism. Shas and United Torah Judaism continued to exclude women from their candidate lists in 2022, while Ra'am elected its first woman Knesset member in 2020.

Political power in Israel is held disproportionately by Jewish men; while Ashkenazim (Jews of European descent) have historically enjoyed particular advantages, Mizrahim (Jews of Middle Eastern descent) have gained representation in recent decades.

In 2018, the Knesset adopted a new "basic law" known as the nation-state law, which introduced the principle that the right to exercise self-determination in the State of Israel belongs uniquely to the Jewish people, among other discriminatory provisions. The basic laws of Israel are considered equivalent to a constitution, and critics of the nation-state law said it created a framework for the erosion of non-Jewish citizens' political and civil rights, though any such effects have been limited to date.

Arab citizens of Israel, who often identify as Palestinian, already faced some discrimination in practice, both legal and informal. Until 2021, no Arab party had ever been formally included in a governing coalition, and Arabs generally do not serve in senior positions in government. Members of other ethnic and religious minority populations, as well as LGBT+ Israelis, enjoy some representation in the Knesset and the political system more broadly.

The roughly 670,000 Jewish settlers in the West Bank and East Jerusalem are Israeli citizens and can participate in Israeli elections. Arab residents of East Jerusalem have the option of obtaining Israeli citizenship, though most decline for political reasons. According to official government figures, those who have attempted to obtain citizenship face significant delays and are rejected in 66 percent of cases. While these noncitizens are entitled to vote in municipal as well as Palestinian Authority (PA) elections, most have traditionally boycotted Israeli municipal balloting, and Israel has restricted PA election activity in the city. A Palestinian Jerusalem resident who is not a citizen cannot become mayor under current Israeli law. Israeli law strips noncitizens of their Jerusalem residency if they are away for extended periods, and a law adopted in 2018 empowers the interior minister to revoke such residency for those deemed to be involved in terrorism or treason-related offenses. Citizenship and residency status are overwhelmingly denied to Palestinian residents of the West Bank or Gaza Strip who are married to Israeli citizens.

Courts can revoke the citizenship of any Israeli convicted of spying, treason, or aiding the enemy. Separately, it was reported during 2017 that the Interior Ministry had revoked the citizenship of dozens and possibly thousands of Bedouins over several years, citing decades-old registration errors. Lawmakers have since raised questions about the legality of this ongoing practice.

Jewish immigrants and their immediate families are granted Israeli citizenship and residence rights. It is extremely difficult in practice for non-Jewish immigrants to obtain citizenship.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The government and parliament are free to set and implement policies and laws without undue interference from unelected entities.

Starting in 2019, Israel entered a period of political instability, due to the inability of any single bloc to form a stable government. The Netanyahu government formed in 2022 enjoys a clear majority and internal homogeneity and is generally expected to remain stable.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption scandals are common in all levels of government, and high-level corruption investigations are relatively frequent, with senior officials implicated in several scandals and criminal cases in recent years. In 2019, then prime minister Netanyahu was indicted on charges of fraud, bribery, and breach of trust for allegedly accepting expensive gifts, his apparent attempt to collude with the owner of the newspaper Yedioth Ahronoth to secure positive coverage, and the granting of regulatory favors to telecommunications operator and media conglomerate Bezeq in return for positive coverage. Netanyahu denied the charges against him and accused law enforcement bodies of perpetrating "an attempted coup," a sentiment amplified by right-wing media outlets.

Netanyahu refused to step down as prime minister after the indictment and held office through the first half of 2021, after which he became leader of the opposition. Netanyahu was reelected as prime minister following the November 2022 elections and is expected to pursue legislative approval of an immunity bill that would shield him and other lawmakers from prosecution while in office. Netanyahu's trial has been ongoing since April 2021. Netanyahu's supporters, including his son Yair Netanyahu, have been accused of attempting to intimidate prosecution witnesses.

Netanyahu and his supporters have also accused the Israeli police, the Ministry of Justice, and the attorney general's office of conspiring to "silence" Netanyahu and to carry out a coup against his right-wing government. Sources within Israeli law enforcement institutions told reporters during 2021 and 2022 that Israeli police chief Kobi Shabtai has discouraged investigations into corruption and cut the resources available for such complex investigations, due to fears of government backlash.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Israel's laws, political practices, civil society groups, and independent media generally ensure a substantial level of governmental transparency, though recent corruption cases have illustrated persistent shortcomings. The Freedom of Information Law grants every citizen and resident of Israel the right to receive information from a public authority. However, the law includes blanket exemptions that allow officials to withhold information on the armed forces, intelligence services, the Atomic Energy Agency, and the prison system, potentially enabling the concealment of abuses. Additionally, authorities often fail to respond to freedom of information requests in a timely manner, leading individuals and civil society organizations to turn to the courts to compel the government to respond.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 43 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The Israeli media sector is vibrant and free to criticize government policy. While the scope of permissible reporting is generally broad, print articles on security matters are subject to a military censor. According to official statistics released in June 2022, the military partially redacted a total of 1,313 news items and fully barred publication of 129 others in 2021, out of 7,413 stories submitted for review; the figures represented an 11-year low. The Government Press Office has occasionally withheld press cards from journalists to restrict them from entering Israel, citing security considerations.

Despite the existence of robust legal protections for journalists, Netanyahu's tenure as prime minister negatively affected the public's trust in the media, which Netanyahu and his allies portrayed as traitors seeking to unseat him. As a result, journalists describe being discouraged from reporting on topics that were perceived to be sympathetic to Palestinians, or frame reporting in a way that would not seem "leftist." Netanyahu's efforts to undermine the independence of Israel's national broadcaster Kan and financially weaken commercial television channels have had a chilling effect on the desire of these media outlets to investigate misconduct or corruption allegations implicating influential politicians.

Most Israeli media outlets are not financially independent, and are affected by the commercial interest of their owners, sometimes resulting in coverage biased toward the owners' business and political interests. In one recent example, the editor in chief of Yedioth Ahronoth and Ynet, businessman Nochi Dankner, and the owner of the Walla! News websites, Shaul Alowitz, attempted to secure regulatory favors from then prime minister Netanyahu in exchange for favorable coverage. Legal cases against the three, who were indicted on several corruption charges, were ongoing at the end of 2022.

While Israel defines itself as a Jewish state, freedom of religion is largely respected. Christian, Muslim, Druze, and Baha'i communities have jurisdiction over their own members in matters of marriage, divorce, and burial. The Orthodox establishment governs personal status matters among Jews, drawing objections from many non-Orthodox Israelis. Orthodox parties have enough political power to block government decisions relating to religion and the state; for example, despite majority support from the Israeli public, no civil or gay marriage exists in Israel, and public transportation is largely unavailable on the Sabbath or religious holidays.

Although the law protects the religious sites of non-Jewish groups, they face discrimination in the allocation of state resources as well as persistent cases of vandalism or harassment, which usually go unsolved.

Citing security concerns, Israeli authorities have set varying limits on access to the Temple Mount/Haram al-Sharif in East Jerusalem in recent years, affecting worshippers across the broader area. During 2021 and 2022, Israeli authorities had increasingly allowed Jewish prayer at the site without openly announcing a change in policy, and the number of Jewish worshippers ascending to the Mount has increased. At the Western Wall of the compound, long a site of Jewish prayer, rival advocacy groups have been engaged in an ongoing dispute over access for women and non-Orthodox Jewish worshippers.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Primary and secondary education is universal, though divided into multiple public school systems (state, state-religious, independent religious, Arabic-Christian, Arabic-Druze, and Arabic-Muslim) as well as private schools. School quality and resources are generally lower in mostly non-Jewish communities. A 2018 law bans groups that are in favor of legal action abroad against Israeli soldiers, or that otherwise undermine state educational goals by criticizing the military, from entering Israeli schools or interacting with students. Attempts to influence or restrict academic freedom at universities are generally blocked.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

While private discussion in Israel is generally open and free, there are some restrictions on political expression. For example, the 2011 Boycott Law exposes Israeli individuals and groups to civil lawsuits if they advocate an economic, cultural, or academic boycott of the state of Israel or West Bank settlements.

The Haaretz newspaper has reported that police have targeted current and former government officials, businesspeople, and others with the Pegasus spyware, which was developed by an Israeli company.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12 (+1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4 (+1)

Protests and demonstrations are widely permitted and typically peaceful. However, some protest activities—such as desecration of the flag of Israel—can draw criminal penalties, and police have sometimes attempted to restrict peaceful demonstrations.

In May 2021, the possible eviction of Palestinian families in East Jerusalem sparked widespread protests, excessive police violence, and intercommunal clashes involving Arab and Jewish civilians in mixed towns within Israel. The unrest included destruction of property and vigilante attacks against unarmed residents. More than 2,000 people were arrested; while some Jews were among those detained, the vast majority were Arabs, suggesting likely police discrimination.

Antigovernment protests largely subsided after Netanyahu lost his premiership in June 2021, though some demonstrations did take place in front of the prime minister's residence while Naftali Bennett was in office. In December 2022, thousands of protesters rallied against Netanyahu's return as prime minister; unlike in 2021, police generally did not respond with force.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because there was no repetition of the widespread violence by both police and civilians that had accompanied the 2021 protests against planned evictions of Palestinian families in East Jerusalem.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The environment for nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) has deteriorated in recent years. A law enacted in 2012 requires NGOs to submit financial reports four times a year on support received from foreign government sources. Under a 2016 law, NGOs that receive more than half of their funding from foreign governments must disclose this fact publicly and in any written or oral communications with elected officials. The measure mainly affects groups associated with the political left that oppose Israel's policies toward Palestinians; foreign funding for right-leaning groups that support Jewish settlements in the West Bank, for example, more often comes from private sources.

A 2017 law bars access to the country for any foreign individuals or groups that publicly support a boycott of Israel or its West Bank settlements. The measure was criticized by civil society organizations as an obstacle to the activities of many pro-Palestinian and human rights groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers may join unions and have the right to strike and bargain collectively, although employers often attempt to prevent such moves. Most of the workforce either belongs to Histadrut, the national labor federation, or is covered by its social programs and bargaining agreements. Histadrut also competes with independent union organizations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent and regularly rules against the government. The Supreme Court has historically played a crucial role in protecting minority groups and overturning decisions by the government and the parliament when they threaten human rights. The court hears direct petitions from citizens and other individuals in Israel as well as Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and the state generally adheres to court rulings.

Some right-wing politicians have advocated reforms that would allow the Knesset to override the Supreme Court when it strikes down legislation. Lawmakers overwhelmingly rejected such a bill in 2020.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Although due process is largely guaranteed in ordinary cases, those suspected of security-related offenses are subject to special legal provisions. Individuals can be held in administrative detention without trial for renewable six-month terms. According to human rights groups, at the end of 2022, more than 4,600 Palestinians from the occupied territories were being held in Israeli facilities on security grounds, including over 860 in administrative detention—the greatest number of administrative detainees since 2008. As of August 2022, all administrative detainees were Palestinians, 11 of whom held Israeli citizenship. The Supreme Court almost never grants attorneys' requests to void administrative detention orders. Under criminal law, individuals suspected of security offenses can be held for up to 96 hours without judicial review under certain circumstances, and be denied access to an attorney for up to 21 days.

Scores of Palestinian children (aged 12–17) from the occupied territories are held in Israeli military detention. Although Israeli law prohibits the detention of children younger than 12, some are occasionally held. Most Palestinian child detainees are serving sentences—handed down by a special military court for minors created in 2009—for throwing stones or other projectiles at Israeli troops in the West Bank; acquittals on such charges are very rare, and the military courts have been criticized for a lack of due process protections. East Jerusalem Palestinian minors are tried in Israeli civilian juvenile courts.

Israeli border communities receive occasional rocket and artillery fire from militant groups in the Gaza Strip, and more rarely from Lebanon and Syria. In August 2022, several Israeli communities were targeted with rockets fired from Gaza by the militant group Palestinian Islamic Jihad (PIJ), which is designated as a terrorist group by the United States, after Israeli forces assassinated a number of the group's top commanders. Most rockets in recent conflicts have been intercepted by the Israeli military due to the use of air defense systems, preventing harm to civilians. Israeli security forces and civilians also face the ongoing threat of small-scale terrorist attacks, most often involving stabbings or vehicular assaults. In 2022, 31 Israeli citizens were killed in Palestinian militant attacks in Israel and the West Bank, according to Israeli NGO Rescue Without Borders. Human rights groups have sometimes accused police of using deadly force against stone throwers or perpetrators of stabbing and vehicular attacks.

According to the Abraham Initiatives, an Israeli interfaith NGO, roughly 120 murders were recorded in Arab communities in Israel during 2022. Arabs account for the vast majority of murder victims each year despite representing about a fifth of the population, and police are far less likely to solve murders with Arab as opposed to Jewish victims. As part of a coordinated government response to the problem, 2021 budget legislation included new spending on socioeconomic development and law enforcement in Arab communities, and the domestic intelligence service was deployed to help combat criminal activity, drawing mixed reactions from Arab politicians and activists.

The Supreme Court banned torture in a 1999 ruling, but said physical coercion might be permissible during interrogations in cases involving an imminent threat. Human rights organizations accuse the authorities of continuing to use some forms of physical abuse and other measures such as isolation, sleep deprivation, psychological threats and pressure, painful binding, and humiliation.

Jewish citizens of Israel, particularly those of Ashkenazi descent, typically enjoy practical advantages relative to the rest of the population on matters including legal treatment and socioeconomic conditions.

Arab or Palestinian citizens of Israel face de facto discrimination in education, social services, personal security, and access to housing and related permits. The 2018 nation-state law downgraded Arabic from an official language of the country to a language with "special status," while another clause states that the change would not "affect the status given to the Arabic language before this law came into force," suggesting that it would be a largely symbolic demotion.

The 2018 nation-state law also declared that the state "views the development of Jewish settlement as a national value, and shall act to encourage and promote its establishment and strengthening." The Jewish National Fund (JNF-KKL), which owns about 13 percent of the land in Israel, has effectively maintained a Jewish-only land-leasing policy. In December 2022, the newly formed coalition government presented its platform to the Knesset, which included a declaration that "the Jewish people have an exclusive and indisputable right to all parts of the Land of Israel," a designation that is commonly understood to refer to territory outside of the official Israeli state, including the West Bank.

Many of Israel's Bedouin citizens live in towns and villages that are not recognized by the state. Those in unrecognized villages cannot claim social services, are in some cases off the electricity and water grids, and have no official land rights. The government routinely demolishes their structures build without a license.

Israelis of Ethiopian origin suffer from discrimination—including in the criminal justice system—and lag behind the general population economically despite government integration efforts.

Women are treated equally in criminal and civil courts and have achieved substantial parity within Israeli society, though economic and other forms of discrimination persist, particularly among Arab and religious Jewish communities. Religious courts that rule on family law cases systematically discriminate against women. Arab women are far less likely to be employed than either Arab men or Jewish women.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation is illegal, though LGBT+ people continue to face bias in some communities. Gay and transgender Israelis are permitted to serve openly in the military.

Individuals who enter the country irregularly, including asylum seekers, can be detained for up to a year without charges. Asylum applications, when fully processed, are rejected in over 99 percent of cases. Appeals of these decisions are handled by the Appeals Tribunal, a specialized immigration court that overwhelmingly issues rulings in line with the government's position. In recent years, authorities have pressured thousands of African asylum seekers who entered the country irregularly—mostly from Eritrea and Sudan—to agree to be deported to a third country, such as Rwanda or Uganda. There have been few new irregular entries since a barrier along the border with Egypt was completed in 2012, though there were more than 26,000 asylum seekers in the country as of 2022.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Security measures can sometimes present obstacles to freedom of movement, though military checkpoints are restricted to the West Bank. Informal local rules that prevent driving on the Sabbath and Jewish holidays can also hamper free movement.

In June 2022, the Ministry of Interior issued a new regulation that prohibits asylum seekers from working outside of construction, agriculture, institution-based caregiving, hotels, and restaurants. The regulation, which came into effect in October and applies to 17 municipalities with large numbers of asylum seekers, was made possible by an October 2021 Supreme Court ruling that determined that limiting the employment of asylum seekers is permitted by Israeli law. A number of asylum seekers filed an appeal against the regulation in September 2022.

Migrant workers in the caregiving sector are only allowed to work within a specific geographical area assigned to them, and can only switch employers three times in the span of their time in Israel, which is generally capped at five years.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights within Israel are effectively protected, and business activity is generally free of undue interference. Businesses face a low risk of expropriation or criminal activity, and corruption is not a major obstacle for private investors. Migrant workers and asylum seekers are barred from owning businesses, forcing them to hire Israeli partners to be able to run their business. However, the authorities' general commitment to property rights has been called into question given their handling of unrecognized Bedouin villages and their settlement policies in the occupied territories.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally guaranteed. However, since religious courts oversee personal status issues, women face some disadvantages in divorce and other matters. Many ultra-Orthodox Jewish communities attempt to enforce unofficial rules on gender separation and personal attire in the public sphere. Marriages between Jews and non-Jews are not recognized by the state unless conducted abroad, nor are marriages involving a Muslim woman and a non-Muslim man. Israel recognizes same-sex marriages conducted abroad. Nonbiological parents in same-sex partnerships are eligible for guardianship rights. A 2018 law extended surrogacy rights to women without a male partner but not to men without a female partner, effectively excluding gay men. In June 2022, a parliamentary committee approved loosening restrictions on Israel's abortion law; among other things, access to abortion pills will be provided through Israel's health care system.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Israel remains a destination for human-trafficking victims, and African students, migrant workers, and asylum seekers residing in the country are especially vulnerable to forced labor and other forms of exploitation. In 2021, the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report demoted Israel to Tier 2, citing the government's insufficient efforts to combat human trafficking. Roughly 30 percent of Palestinian laborers working in Israel have been forced to pay illegal fees to brokers to obtain Israeli work permits; those forced to pay the fee thus enter Israel in debt, making them less likely to quit due to abusive employment conditions. Some migrant workers in the caregiving sector who left their employers due to abuse have had their visas voided by Israeli authorities without a hearing.

Italy

Population: 58,900,000
Capital: Rome
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Italy's parliamentary system features competitive multiparty elections. Civil liberties are generally respected, but concerns about the rights of migrants and LGBT+ people persist, and regional inequalities are persistent and substantial. Endemic problems with corruption and organized crime pose an enduring challenge to the rule of law and economic growth.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In July, Prime Minister Mario Draghi resigned following the collapse of his national unity government. Draghi's coalition fell apart when three of his main partners boycotted a confidence vote he had called.
- In September snap elections, a right-wing coalition led by Giorgia Meloni of the far-right Brothers of Italy party won the largest share of the vote and Meloni became Italy's first female prime minister.

- In January, Sergio Mattarella was reelected Italian president after eight rounds of voting.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 36 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Parliament and regional representatives elect the president, whose role is largely ceremonial but sometimes politically influential, for a seven-year term. The legitimacy of the presidential vote rests largely on the fairness of legislative elections. Sergio Mattarella, a former constitutional judge, was reelected president with strong backing in January 2022 after support failed to coalesce around a successor in the seven previous rounds of voting.

The president appoints the prime minister, who serves as head of government and is often, but not always, the leader of the largest party in the Chamber of Deputies, Italy's lower house. The prime minister proposes a Council of Ministers that requires confirmation by parliament.

In July 2022, the national unity government formed in January 2021 and led by Draghi—the third government formed following the 2018 elections—collapsed after three of Draghi's main coalition partners boycotted a confidence vote he had called. Draghi resigned following the boycotted vote, and Mattarella dissolved parliament and called for snap national elections, which were held in September. Georgia Meloni of the far-right Brothers of Italy party was sworn in as prime minister in October, after her right-wing alliance took control of both the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies in the September elections. The coalition government includes Matteo Salvini's far-right League and former prime minister Silvio Berlusconi's center-right Forward Italy (Forza Italia) in addition to the Brothers of Italy.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The bicameral parliament consists of the 400-member Chamber of Deputies and the 200-member Senate. The September 2022 snap elections were the first that incorporated a drastic reduction in the number of parliamentary seats—down from 630 in the Chamber of Deputies and 315 in the Senate—that voters had approved in a 2020 referendum. Members of both houses are popularly elected for five-year terms, though the president can appoint five additional senators, and former presidents are also entitled to Senate seats.

The September 2022 elections were considered free and fair by international observers. The right-wing coalition led by Meloni won the largest share of the vote for both houses.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

While Italy's electoral framework and campaign finance regulations are complex, the elections they enable have consistently been deemed fair and credible.

The current electoral law, adopted by parliament in 2017, introduced a mixed system in both houses, with 36 percent of seats allocated using the first-past-the-post method, and 64 percent using a proportional, party-list method. The law encouraged coalition governments, as demonstrated by the 2018 and 2022 election results. In the 2022 elections, 18-year-old voters were able to take part in the election of senators as well as members of the Chamber of Deputies for the first time, in accord with a 2021 constitutional amendment reducing the legal voting age for Senate elections, which had previously been 25.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

Political parties are generally able to form and operate freely, and the political landscape features a high level of pluralism and competition. Since the beginning of the 1990s, politics have been characterized by unstable coalitions and the frequent emergence of new parties.

Following violent protests against COVID-19 vaccinations that took place in October 2021, some parties called on the government to ban neofascist movements that participated in the protests, but it did not do so.

Italy has a long record of frequent changes in the governing coalition, with multiple transfers of power since the early 1990s. In the 2022 elections, center-left and centrist parties, who were unable to form large coalitions on the order of the right-wing alliance, collectively won more votes than Meloni's bloc, but the electoral law awards a third of seats on a first-past-the-post system, which favors broad coalitions, thus granting a solid majority in both houses of parliament to the right.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

The public is generally free to make political choices without undue interference. However, organized crime groups retain some ability to intimidate and influence politicians, especially at the local level, and to establish corruption networks abetted by public administrators. In 2022, the government dissolved several town councils over ties to local mafia-like groups, and some cases of mafia-related vote-buying were discovered in 2022 local elections.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Electoral laws contain provisions designed to encourage political participation by linguistic minorities, and to promote gender parity, though progress toward full political representation for women and LGBT+ people remains slow. Although Meloni is Italy's first-ever female prime minister, women's representation in parliament decreased following the 2022 elections, against the positive trend recorded in the past two decades. After the election, women made up 32 percent of the Chamber of Deputies and 34 percent of the Senate.

During the 2022 vote, transgender and gender-nonconforming voters complained of discrimination at many polling stations, where voters were forced into gender-segregated queues to vote.

The political participation rights accorded to migrants, and even to their descendants born in Italy, are extremely limited in national and local politics, a dynamic exacerbated by the emergence of a xenophobic and nationalist discourse in recent years and by the failure of citizenship reforms. In March 2022, a draft reform of the citizenship law to grant Italian citizenship to those born in Italy to foreign parents, those who entered Italy before the age of 12, and those who regularly attended school in the country, was adopted by the Chamber of Deputies but did not progress. According to survey data collected by the organization ActionAid, between 1.8 million and 2.5 million people are excluded from citizenship in Italy despite being born or raised there.

European Union (EU) citizens are entitled to vote in local elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are able to craft and implement policy without improper interference from unelected entities. However, Italy has not yet adopted comprehensive lobbying regulations at the national level.

In the lead-up to the September 2022 elections, there was intense speculation that Italian right-wing parties could be among those implicated in a US intelligence dossier describing covert Russian government funding of some right-wing parties in other countries.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem despite long-term efforts to combat it, and its impact is exacerbated when officials and members of organized crime networks jointly carry out graft schemes. The perception among experts and business executives is that the level of public-sector corruption is relatively high. An anticorruption law adopted in 2019 tightened sanctions for corruption, reformed statutes of limitation to limit stalling tactics, and extended existing antimafia investigative tools to include corruption offenses. Despite this increased capacity, many sectors, including public procurement, require additional reforms to limit graft.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The legal framework mandates administrative transparency and access to public information through the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) adopted in 2016. Although the legislation designates access to information as a fundamental right, efforts to ensure compliance with FOIA requests by public administrators remain incomplete.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 54 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of the press is constitutionally guaranteed. Despite the rapid growth of the online news industry, traditional media still play a large role in news consumption. There are more than 100 daily newspapers, most of them locally or regionally based, as well as political party papers, free papers, and weekly publications. Concentration of ownership remains a major concern. Internet access is generally unrestricted.

The frequency of strategic lawsuits against public participation (SLAPPs)—lawsuits used to intimidate or silence journalists and others who publicize matters of public interest—poses a threat to investigative journalism.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and respected in practice. There is no official religion; while the Roman Catholic Church receives certain benefits under a treaty with the state, other groups have access to similar benefits through their own accords.

Some local governments have raised obstacles to the construction and recognition of mosques, and right-wing political parties have stoked anti-Muslim attitudes. Antisemitic acts have also trended upward in recent years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are typically able to freely discuss controversial or sensitive topics in public without fear of surveillance or retribution.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The freedom to assemble peacefully is guaranteed in the constitution and typically upheld in practice. In December 2022, parliament approved a law proposed by the government criminalizing large, unlicensed musical gatherings, with punishments of up to six years in prison for those who organize them. When the bill was introduced in October, it banned any gatherings over 50 people that could be perceived as threatening public safety, but its provisions were narrowed following public outcry. However, free assembly advocates continue to express concerns over the vagueness of the law's provisions, even in its narrower form.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally free to organize and operate. In recent years, Italian authorities have engaged in repeated standoffs with NGO-operated ships involved in rescue operations of trafficked and smuggled migrants and refugees in the Mediterranean Sea. NGOs rescued more than 11,000 migrants in 2022. After taking office, the Meloni government announced its intention to pass a new code of conduct targeting and obstructing search-and-rescue NGOs; the measure had not been passed by year's end.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions are generally free to organize and operate. The constitution recognizes the right to strike but places restrictions on strikes by employees in essential sectors like transportation, sanitation, and health, as well as by some self-employed individuals, including lawyers, doctors, and truck drivers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent and autonomous. Allegations of abuse of power and corruption involving members of the High Council of the Judiciary, which controls internal governance of the judiciary, have led to reform. In June 2022, a new law was adopted aimed at reforming aspects of the judicial system such as the "revolving door" between judgeships and other elected public offices. The law also introduced stricter performance evaluation of judges and prosecutors and new rules for the composition of the High Council.

Organized crime networks continue to threaten judges and prosecutors involved in antimafia processes, particularly in Calabria, but state protection measures function adequately.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are largely upheld. However, judicial procedures are often characterized by lengthy delays; Italy has one of the lowest numbers of judges per capita in the EU. The government has been criticized for denying detained migrants access to lawyers. Recent criminal justice reforms include a requirement that initial appeals be resolved within two years, measures to accelerate the digitalization of the justice system, incentives for the use of restorative justice measures, and time limits for the preliminary hearing stage of cases.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

While the population is generally free from major threats to physical security, there have been reports of excessive use of force by police and prison guards, particularly against undocumented migrants. Asylum seekers and undocumented migrants have been held in overcrowded and unhygienic conditions.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The law prohibits discrimination based on gender, race, and sexual orientation, among other categories, and these protections are generally enforced. However, members of the Romany minority have unequal access to housing, and many live in segregated settlements that lack adequate infrastructure. LGBT+ people face societal discrimination and occasional acts of violence, and there are not effective measures protecting them from hate speech and hate crimes.

Italy's treatment of migrants, refugees, and asylum seekers has been subject to significant criticism in recent years. In late 2018, parliament approved legal changes that tightened conditions for granting asylum and humanitarian protection, reduced access to services, and eased deportation conditions. A decree enacted in October 2020 allows migrants and refugees to apply for residency on humanitarian protection grounds if they "risk being subjected to torture or inhumane treatment" at home and expands access to public services, but does not offer regularized status to those who lost legal residency under the 2018 decrees.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals are generally free to travel and to change their place of residence, employment, and education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal and regulatory framework supports property rights and the operation of private businesses, but corruption and organized crime can hinder normal business activity, as can onerous bureaucratic obstacles. Delays in court proceedings often undermine enforcement of protections for property rights.

According to experts on organized crime, mafia groups exploited the social and economic crises provoked by the COVID-19 pandemic, expanding control of cash-starved local businesses via loan-sharking and money-laundering operations.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

The law protects individual freedom on personal status issues such as marriage and divorce. Same-sex civil unions with nearly all the benefits of marriage are permitted, and courts have begun to recognize second-parent adoption rights for same-sex couples. Though public awareness of the problem of domestic violence is increasing due to advocacy campaigns, it remains a persistent issue, and calls to the national domestic violence hotline rose significantly during the COVID-19 lockdown.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

In the last few years, Italy has adopted measures to combat human trafficking and labor exploitation, but both phenomena remain concerns, especially with respect to asylum seekers, refugees, and migrants from Eastern Europe. The COVID-19 pandemic and the energy crisis following the Russian government's full-scale invasion of Ukraine in February 2022 increased migrants' vulnerability to exploitation and worsened labor and living conditions. The trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation remains a concern.

Jamaica

Population: 2,800,000
Capital: Kingston
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Jamaica's political system is democratic and features competitive elections and orderly rotations of power. However, corruption remains a serious problem, and long-standing relationships between officials and organized crime figures are thought to persist. Violent crime remains a concern, as does harassment and violence against LGBT+ people.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In June, the government announced the creation of a constitutional review commission (CRC) to assist Jamaica's envisioned transition into a republic. The CRC, which was not seated by year's end, will also consider preexisting recommendations for constitutional reform.
- In October, the country's Broadcasting Commission (BC) banned radio stations from playing songs deemed to glorify some illegal activity, including the use of some substances. The Media Association of Jamaica (MAJ) criticized the decision, saying the BC was curtailing expression.
- In December, the government introduced National Identification System (NIDS) cards on a pilot basis. The NIDS was originally approved by lawmakers in 2017, but the Supreme Court struck the original scheme down over privacy concerns in 2019.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The British monarch is the ceremonial head of state and is represented by a governor general.

The prime minister is the head of government; the position is appointed after elections by the governor general and goes to the leader of the majority party. The prime minister's legitimacy rests largely on the conduct of legislative elections, which are generally free and fair. Jamaica Labour Party (JLP) leader Andrew Holness became prime minister after the party narrowly won the 2016 election; he retained and strengthened his position in the 2020 election.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Jamaica's bicameral Parliament consists of a 63-member House of Representatives, elected for five years, and a 21-member Senate. Senators, who are appointed, also serve five-year terms.

In the free and fair September 2020 polls, the governing JLP took 57 percent of the vote and 49 seats. Turnout, at 37.9 percent, was the second-lowest figure on record, with the polls being affected by voter apathy and COVID-19.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair, and they are implemented impartially by the Electoral Commission.

In June 2022, the government announced the creation of a CRC to assist the country's envisioned transition into a republic. The CRC, which was not seated by year's end, will also consider preexisting recommendations for constitutional reform.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties form and operate without restriction. Although various smaller parties are active, the social democratic People's National Party (PNP) and the more conservative JLP dominate at the national level.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties operate freely, and political power has alternated between the PNP and JLP.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Powerful criminal organizations can influence voters who live in areas they control. They have used tactics including intimidation to ensure high voter turnout for particular candidates or parties in exchange for political favors; there were scattered reports of such activity in the 2020 election.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women are underrepresented in politics. Women hold 28.6 percent of the lower house's seats, although this is a record.

LGBT+ people face harassment and violence, limiting their ability to engage in political and electoral processes. Political attacks are often couched in anti-LGBT+ rhetoric.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The elected prime minister and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government. However, powerful criminal groups, as well as corruption in politics, can affect democratic policymaking.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Long-standing links between officials and organized crime figures are thought to persist. Government bodies continue to pursue corruption investigations, and cases often end in convictions. Media and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have criticized authorities for their reluctance to pursue some cases, however. Cases have also faced delays. Government whistleblowers are poorly protected.

New anticorruption efforts have been mounted in recent years, supported by an Integrity Commission (IC). However, the IC's effectiveness has been limited by high-profile resignations, delays in issuing reports, and a lack of prosecutions resulting from its work. The IC is also affected by a "gag clause" which prevents it from providing updates on investigations.

Accusations of graft at oil-refining firm Petrojam surfaced in 2019. A trial against its former chairman and general manager, who were both charged over the misuse of Petrojam funds in 2021, continued in 2022.

Former education minister Ruel Reid and Fritz Pinnock, the former president of Caribbean Maritime University, were arrested in 2019 over allegations that they misused public funds. In October 2022, the London-based Privy Council denied their bid to have the charges against them dropped.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

An access-to-information law has been in effect since 2004 but contains a number of exemptions. Legislative processes are often opaque.

In 2020, the JLP government rescinded an informal convention that placed six pivotal parliamentary oversight committees under opposition leadership.

The government was not transparent regarding Foreign Minister Kamina Johnson Smith's unsuccessful run for Commonwealth secretary general. A US-based public relations firm had disclosed its involvement in a legal filing in the United States. Jamaican backers agreed to disclose their participation, but government minister Robert Morgan expressed his disappointment at that decision in a September 2022 comment.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 46 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The constitutional right to free expression is generally respected. Most newspapers are privately owned and express a variety of views. Broadcast media are largely publicly owned but are similarly vibrant.

In October 2022, the BC banned radio stations from playing music deemed to glorify lottery scamming, illegally owned firearms, or the use of illicit drugs. The MAJ strongly criticized the ban, saying the BC did not consult the music industry and was curtailing expression.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally protected and generally respected in practice. Laws banning Obeah, an Afro-Caribbean shamanistic religion, remain on the books but are not actively enforced.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The government does not restrict academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Individuals are generally free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics. However, the presence of powerful criminal groups in some urban neighborhoods can discourage people from openly discussing criminal activities.

The government has worked to introduce the NIDS for several years. Revised legislation, which made enrollment voluntary, was passed in 2021; in 2019, the Supreme Court struck a previous NIDS-related law for violating Jamaicans' privacy. The government implemented NIDS on a pilot basis in December 2022, with Prime Minister Holness promising that user information would be secure.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is provided for by the constitution and is largely respected in practice. Protests are occasionally marred by violence or otherwise unsafe conditions.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Jamaica has a robust and vibrant civil society with many active community groups. However, some struggle financially or have difficulty attracting volunteers. Others are funded by the central government but largely act autonomously. NGOs are well represented in the education, health, and environment sectors.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Around 20 percent of the workforce is unionized, and antiunion discrimination is illegal. Labor unions are politically influential and have the right to strike. However, workers in essential services must undergo an arbitration process with the Ministry of Labor and Social Security before they may legally strike, and the definition of the work constituting "essential services" is broad. There are reports of private employers laying off unionized workers and then rehiring them as contract workers.

The Industrial Disputes Tribunal (IDT) is allowed to reinstate workers whose dismissals are found to be unjustified, although cases before the IDT often take some time to be heard.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Judicial independence is constitutionally guaranteed. While the judiciary is widely considered independent, corruption remains a problem in some lower courts.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

A large backlog of cases and a shortage of court staff continue to undermine the justice system. The vast majority of arrests are made without a warrant, detainees frequently lack access to legal counsel, and trials are often delayed for many years or dismissed due to systemic failures. A 2017 law increased avenues for the resolution of cases outside trial; some defendants have reportedly been unwilling to consider plea deals since its passage.

In October 2022, a new Bail Act, which would reduce the number of individuals on remand through the use of electronic tracking, was tabled in Parliament. A parliamentary committee was reviewing the bill as of December.

Killings by police remain a serious problem in Jamaica. According to the government's Independent Commission of Investigations, 164 people died in incidents involving security personnel in 2022. Prosecutions for illegal killings by security officers are rare. In September, Jamaica's security minister was criticized for saying police officers should shoot to kill if defending themselves.

Jamaica has one of the highest homicide rates in the Americas. The police reported 1,498 murders in 2022, a slight increase over the 1,474 reported in 2021. The country is a transit point for cocaine; much of the country's violence, particularly in Kingston, is the result of warfare between drug-trafficking gangs. Vigilantism is also a major concern. Many initiatives to address the problem have been undertaken, but crime and violence are deeply entrenched.

States of emergency, which provide expanded authority to security forces, are frequently imposed in response to localized spikes in violence. A new Firearms Act, which took effect in November 2022, increased penalties for the illegal possession of firearms and reformed the regime on their use, handling, sale, and management. That same month, the government offered a brief amnesty for those surrendering illegal or unregistered weapons or ammunition.

Harassment and violence targeting LGBT+ people remain major concerns, and such instances are frequently ignored by the police. Anti-LGBT+ discrimination is pervasive, though some politicians have spoken out in support of LGBT+ rights.

Article 76 of the colonial-era Offences against the Person Act (OPA) criminalizes the act of buggery; men engaging in same-sex acts could be punished with hard labor lasting as long as 10 years. In 2014, the government expanded the OPA to criminalize the promotion of violence against any category of persons, including LGBT+ individuals, via audio or visual materials. In a nonbinding 2021 ruling, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights called on Kingston to repeal parts of the OPA that criminalize same-sex relations, but the justice minister rejected that ruling.

In 2020, the government accepted several proposals made by the UN Human Rights Council, including new antidiscrimination policies and improving investigations into cases of violence against LGBT+ people.

Women enjoy the same legal rights as men but suffer employment discrimination and are often paid less for the same work. Acceptance of Rastafarians is increasing, but discrimination persists, particularly in schools.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Constitutional freedom-of-movement guarantees are impacted by political and communal violence in practice. States of emergency are regularly enacted, with affected residents facing roadblocks, random searches, and identity checks. Several of these were implemented in 2022. There are no formal restrictions on people's ability to change their place of employment or education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Jamaica has an active private sector and a powerful probusiness lobby. Individuals are free to establish businesses subject to legal requirements, which are not onerous. Recent reforms have included expediting the incorporation process, making electricity in Kingston more consistent, and easing the import process. Corruption and crime can still hamper normal business activity.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Legal protections for women and girls are poorly enforced, and violence and discrimination remain widespread. There is no blanket ban on spousal rape, nor are there laws against sexual harassment. Child abuse, including sexual abuse, is widespread. Abortion is illegal under the OPA, though pregnant Jamaicans are known to pursue the procedure.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Residents of neighborhoods where criminal groups are influential risk becoming victims of human traffickers.

Child sex tourism occurs in some resort areas according to local NGOs. In the 2022 edition of its Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department noted that the authorities reported no investigations, prosecutions, or convictions for such activity.

Japan

Population: 124,900,000
Capital: Tokyo
Freedom Status: Free
Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Japan is a multiparty parliamentary democracy. The ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) has governed almost continuously since 1955, with stints in opposition from 1993 to 1994 and 2009 to 2012. Political rights and civil liberties are generally well respected. Outstanding challenges include ethnic and gender-based discrimination and claims of improperly close relations between government and the business sector.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In a rare instance of public violence, former prime minister Shinzō Abe was assassinated during a July campaign rally. The gunman reportedly blamed the Unification Church for bankrupting his family and targeted Abe due to his close political relationship with the organization. It later emerged that many LDP politicians had links to the church, raising concerns about their tacit endorsement or protection of its controversial practices, including its financial demands on adherents. In a cabinet reshuffle in August, seven ministers with connections to the church were replaced.
- The LDP and its coalition partner were able to maintain their majority in the July upper house elections, securing 146 of the chamber's 248 seats.
- Separately in July, the government announced that it would review a program in which hundreds of thousands of foreign workers are employed in Japan as "trainees," amid growing evidence of exploitative conditions within the program.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister is the head of government and is chosen by the freely elected parliament. The prime minister selects the cabinet, which can include a limited number of ministers who are not members of the parliament. Japan's emperor serves as head of state in a ceremonial capacity.

In September 2021, following the resignation of Yoshihide Suga, the LDP chose Fumio Kishida as its new leader, and the parliament voted to confirm him as prime minister a few days later. Kishida won a fresh mandate from lawmakers in November of that year, following the October parliamentary elections.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The parliament, or Diet, has two chambers. The more powerful lower house, the House of Representatives, has 465 members elected to maximum four-year terms through a mixture of single-member districts and proportional representation. The upper house, the House of Councillors, has 248 members serving fixed six-year terms, with half elected every three years using a mixture of nationwide proportional representation and prefecture-based voting. The prime minister and his cabinet can dissolve the lower house, but not the upper house. The lower house can also pass a no-confidence resolution that forces the cabinet to either resign or dissolve the lower house.

Legislative elections in Japan are free and fair. In the October 2021 lower house elections, the LDP won 259 seats, and its coalition partner, Komeito, took 32. Some independents later joined the LDP, adding to its majority. The largest opposition group, the Constitutional Democratic Party (CDP), won 96 seats, and smaller parties and independents captured the remainder.

In the July 2022 upper house elections, the LDP and Komeito won 76 seats out of the 125 contested, giving them a majority of 146 seats in the chamber. The CDP won 17 seats, while smaller parties and independents again accounted for the remainder.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Japan's electoral laws are generally fair and well enforced. Campaigning is heavily regulated, which typically benefits incumbents, although the rules are applied equally to all candidates.

Malapportionment in favor of the rural districts from which the LDP draws significant support has been a persistent problem, despite a series of reforms to reduce the disparity with urban districts. Three members were added to the upper house in 2022 as part of the reform effort. After courts ruled that the level of malapportionment in the 2021 lower house elections had been "in a state of unconstitutionality," the Diet adopted legislation in November 2022 to revise boundaries for as many as 140 districts, with the aim of keeping the disparity between the most and least populated districts below a two-to-one ratio.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

Parties generally do not face undue restrictions on registration or operation. Ten parties were represented in the Diet as of 2022, and independents also held a number of seats in each chamber. Splits and mergers among existing parties are not uncommon.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

While the LDP has governed for most of Japan's postwar history, there have been democratic transfers of power to and from alternative parties. Opposition parties are represented in the parliament and govern at the subnational level.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from improper interference by powerful interests that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Citizens enjoy equal rights to vote and run in elections regardless of gender, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation, or gender identity.

Women remain underrepresented in government. While a nonbinding 2018 gender parity law urges parties to nominate equal numbers of male and female candidates, 33.2 percent of all candidates and 28.0 percent of winning candidates in the 2022 upper house elections were women, for a total of 64 women in the chamber. Women held 46 seats, or less than 10 percent of the total, in the lower house of the Diet as of 2022.

About 600,000 ethnic Koreans born in Japan hold special residency privileges but not Japanese citizenship, meaning they are ineligible to participate in any elections at the national and local levels. Most but not all are South Korean nationals, and they have the option of applying for Japanese citizenship.

The Ainu, an Indigenous people numbering at least 20,000, live mostly on the northern island of Hokkaido. The Ainu Party was launched in 2012 to increase their political representation, though it has yet to win seats in the Diet.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are free to govern without undue interference, though senior civil servants have some influence over policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

The prevalence of corruption in government is relatively low, media coverage of political corruption scandals is widespread and vigorous, and officials who are implicated face criminal prosecution. In the second half of 2022, prosecutors arrested officials at several companies for allegedly bribing a former member of the 2020 Tokyo Olympic Games organizing committee to win official sponsorships.

Some government officials have close relations with business leaders that could raise concerns about conflicts of interest. Retiring bureaucrats often quickly secure high-paying positions with companies that receive significant government contracts.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government generally operates with openness and transparency. Access to information legislation allows individuals to request information from government agencies, though in practice the law has not always been implemented effectively. Government officials have at times withheld information from lawmakers and the public in connection with political scandals. In January 2022, the Ministry of Land, Infrastructure, Transport, and Tourism punished 10 officials who were found to have been involved in overstating government data on monthly construction orders, which are used to calculate Japan's gross domestic product.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of the press is guaranteed in the constitution, and Japan has a highly competitive media sector. However, press freedom advocates have criticized a 2014 law that allows journalists to be prosecuted for revealing state secrets, even if the information was unknowingly obtained. A 2017 report by the UN special rapporteur on freedom of expression noted concern about pressure on the media from the government, and recommended the repeal of Article 4 of the Broadcast Act, which gives the government the power to determine what information is "fair" and thus acceptable for public broadcast.

Under the traditional kisha kurabu (press club) system, institutions such as government ministries and corporate organizations have restricted the release of news to journalists and media outlets with membership in their clubs. While the club system has been criticized for privileging the major dailies and other established outlets that belong to it and potentially encouraging self-censorship, in recent years online media and weekly newsmagazines have challenged the daily papers' dominance of political news with more aggressive reporting.

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the constitution, and there are no substantial barriers to religious practice or the expression of nonbelief. The constitution also stipulates that no religious organization shall receive any privileges from the state.

In July 2022, during a campaign rally for a candidate in the upper house elections, former prime minister Shinzō Abe was assassinated. The gunman, who was quickly detained, reportedly blamed the Unification Church for bankrupting his family through its controversial extraction of donations and other revenue from adherents, and he targeted Abe because the former leader had a close political relationship with the church. Subsequent news reports revealed links between many LDP politicians and the Unification Church, raising concerns about their tacit endorsement or protection of the religious group's practices. In a cabinet reshuffle in August, Kishida dismissed seven ministers who had disclosed connections to the church. The LDP conducted its own investigation, stating in September that 179 of its 379 members of parliament had disclosed links to the church and related organizations.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and mostly respected in practice, but education and textbooks have long been a focus of public and political debate. While there is not a national curriculum or single official history text, the Ministry of Education's screening process has approved textbooks that downplay Japan's history of imperialism and war atrocities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

The government generally does not restrict personal expression or private discussion. Some observers have raised concerns that antiterrorism and anticonspiracy legislation that went into effect in 2017 could permit undue surveillance.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected under the constitution, and peaceful demonstrations take place frequently. In 2022, protests were held on topics including nuclear disarmament, the 2021 military coup in Myanmar, and the Russian invasion of Ukraine.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally free from undue restrictions and remained diverse and active in 2022.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Most workers have the legal right to organize, bargain collectively, and strike. However, public-sector workers are barred from striking, and some, such as firefighters and prison staff, cannot form unions. Labor unions are active and exert political influence through the Japanese Trade Union Confederation and other groupings.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Japan's judiciary is independent, and judges cannot be removed arbitrarily. Japanese citizens may remove individual Supreme Court judges through a majority vote in periodic reviews that coincide with parliamentary elections. In November 2022, in compliance with a Supreme Court ruling that May, the Diet adopted legislation that allows Japanese citizens living abroad to participate in these national votes.

For serious criminal cases, a judicial panel composed of professional judges and saiban-in (lay judges), selected from the general public, render verdicts.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are generally upheld. However, observers have argued that trials often favor the prosecution. There are reports that suspects have been detained on flimsy evidence, arrested multiple times for the same alleged crime, or subjected to lengthy interrogations that yield what amount to forced confessions. Police can detain suspects for up to 23 days without charge. Access to those in pretrial detention is sometimes limited.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

People in Japan are generally protected from the illegitimate use of physical force and the threat of war and insurgencies. Violent crime rates are low. However, organized crime is fairly prominent, particularly in the construction and nightlife sectors; crime groups also run drug-trafficking and loan-sharking operations.

Prisoners who face death sentences or are accused of crimes that could carry the death penalty are held in solitary confinement, sometimes for years at a time. There are frequent reports of substandard medical care in prisons. One person was executed in 2022, having been convicted of multiple murders.

Societal discrimination against foreigners and various minority groups has generally declined over time, but it can affect access to housing and employment.

A law adopted in 2016 was intended to eliminate discrimination against Japan's estimated three million burakumin—descendants of feudal-era outcasts. The law obliges national and local governments to provide advice, support, and education on the issue, but it does not assign penalties for acts of discrimination.

A 2019 law officially recognized the Ainu as an Indigenous people of Japan, though critics noted that it failed to offer an apology for past mistreatment.

Japan-born descendants of colonial subjects (particularly ethnic Koreans and Chinese) also experience discrimination. A 2016 hate speech law calls on the government to take steps to eliminate discriminatory speech against ethnic minorities, but it does not carry any penalties for perpetrators.

LGBT+ people face social stigma and in some cases harassment. There is no national law barring discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity. In 2016, sexual harassment regulations for national public officials were modified to prohibit harassment on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity. Employment discrimination and sexual harassment against women are common.

Asylum is granted to less than 1 percent of those who apply each year under Japan's strict screening process, and very few refugees are accepted for third-country resettlement in Japan. Soon after Moscow's full-scale invasion of Ukraine in February 2022, the Japanese government agreed to accept friends and relatives of the 1,900 Ukrainians already residing in Japan, designating the newcomers as "evacuees" with temporary residency and work permits. There were more than 2,000 such individuals in the country by year's end.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are few significant restrictions on internal or international travel, or on individuals' ability to change their place of residence, employment, and education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Property rights are generally respected, and individuals are free to establish and operate private businesses.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

While personal social freedoms are mostly protected, there are some limitations. The country's system of family registration, koseki, recognizes people as members of a family unit and requires married couples to share a surname, which usually defaults to the husband's surname. This can create legal complications for women as well as children born out of wedlock or to divorced parents, among others.

There is no legal recognition of same-sex marriage in Japan, though some municipal and prefectural governments, including the Tokyo metropolitan government, have passed legislation allowing the registration of same-sex partnerships.

Domestic violence is punishable by law, and protective orders and other services are available for victims, but such abuse often goes unreported.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Individuals generally enjoy equality of opportunity, and the legal framework provides safeguards against exploitative working conditions. However, long workdays are common in practice and have been criticized as harmful to workers' health. Many workers are temporary or contract employees with substantially lower wages, fewer benefits, and less job security than regular employees.

The government announced in July 2022 that it would review the foreign technology trainee program, in which about 328,000 trainees were participating at that time. According to investigations in some prefectures, roughly 60 to 70 percent of the companies employing foreign trainees violated labor laws, suggesting that abuse and exploitation may be common throughout the program.

Commercial sexual exploitation remains a problem. Traffickers frequently bring foreign women into the country for forced sex work by arranging fraudulent marriages with Japanese men.

Jordan

Population: 11,200,000
Capital: Amman
Freedom Status: Not Free
Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Jordan is a monarchy in which the king plays a dominant role in politics and governance. The parliament's lower house is elected, but the electoral system and limits on civil liberties put the opposition at a disadvantage; the chamber wields little power in practice. The media and civil society groups are hampered by restrictive laws and government pressure. The judicial system lacks independence and often fails to ensure due process.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2022

- In March and April, hundreds of journalists, politicians, and activists involved in the country's Hirak, a broad social and political reform movement, were arrested under vague stipulations in the penal code and the Crime Prevention Law. Authorities carried out the arrests to prevent widespread antigovernment demonstrations and sit-ins planned to protest government corruption and the dissolution of the Teachers' Syndicate, as well as to commemorate the 2011 protest movement.
- In December, truckers and transportation workers in the south of the country went on strike to pressure the government to end price hikes on fuel and address the cost-of-living crisis. Authorities have deployed security forces with heavy weaponry and have arrested dozens of people. The strike actions continued through the end of the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 11 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Jordan's hereditary monarch, King Abdullah II, holds broad executive powers. He appoints and dismisses the prime minister and cabinet, as well as a several other positions such as the crown prince and a regent and may dissolve the bicameral National Assembly at his discretion.

Abdullah II dissolved the parliament in 2020. Bisher al-Khasawneh, a veteran diplomat and royal adviser, was appointed as prime minister.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The king appoints the 65 members of the upper house of the parliament, the Senate. The lower house, the 130-seat House of Representatives, is elected for four-year terms. Its members win office through races in 23 multimember districts, with 15 seats reserved for the leading women candidates who failed to capture district seats. Twelve seats are reserved for religious and ethnic minorities.

The royal court announced its intention to trigger an election in a July 2020 statement, and Abdullah II dissolved the parliament in late September. However, uncertainty over the early-November polling date amid the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic prompted some candidates to delay campaign efforts. International observers, who regularly monitor parliamentary elections, were largely absent.

Independents, many of whom were tribal figures and businesspeople considered loyal to the monarchy, won most seats. The main opposition group, the Islamic Action Front (IAF), the Islah Alliance, and the Muslim Center Party each won 5 seats. Voter turnout stood at 30 percent. Vote buying became more common during the 2020 contest, partially due to the dire economic situation caused by the pandemic.

Elections for mayors, local and municipal councils, and 12 new governorate councils were held in March 2022. Voter turnout was just under 30 percent and the IAF boycotted the polls. The elections were dominated by local tribal politics; only 74 candidates formally announced affiliations to political parties. Al-Hayat Centre for Civil Society Development, a local nongovernmental organization (NGO), reported that a heavy security presence throughout the kingdom on election day compromised the secrecy of ballots. Violence broke out at 10 municipalities after the polling centers closed.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Elections are administered by the Independent Election Commission (IEC), which generally receives positive reviews from international monitors in terms of technical management, though irregularities continue to be reported. However, IEC members are appointed by royal decree.

The 2016 electoral-law reform introduced multiple-vote proportional representation for parliamentary elections, replacing a single nontransferable vote system that favored progovernment businesspeople and tribal elites over opposition-oriented political parties. The new law also redrew district lines to mitigate acute malapportionment that has long placed urban voters at a severe disadvantage. However even after these changes, rural and tribal voters making up the regime's support base, remain heavily overrepresented.

The legal framework for elections is unstable. Major changes are often introduced weeks before polling day, hindering campaign efforts. Candidate registration is reportedly easier in some progovernment areas. A new national electoral law passed in April 2022 lowered the eligibility age for candidates to 25 years old and increased the required proportion of women on party lists.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 6 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Political parties based on ethnicity, race, gender, or religion are banned in Jordan. Parties must receive approval from the Ministry of Political and Parliamentary Affairs and the IEC. Authorities have reportedly intimidated individuals attempting to form political parties and there is a long-standing fear of creating or joining political parties due to the regime's historically harsh repression of them.

While the IAF has been tolerated, it suffers from the electoral system's malapportionment, which weakens its urban support base. Its parent organization, the Muslim Brotherhood, was deregistered in 2015 and was closed in 2016. The government licensed its offshoot group, the Muslim Brotherhood Society (MBS), all of which exacerbated preexisting divisions and weakened it politically. In 2020, the organization lost an appeal against the transfer of its offices to the MBS, with the Court of Cassation ordering its dissolution. The IAF participated in the November 2020 polls despite the ruling.

The electoral system favors tribally affiliated independents over political parties with specific ideologies and platforms, as does the patronage-based political culture. The al-Hayat Center reported that only 12 percent of candidates relied on party-lists to earn votes. New electoral law enacted in March 2022 transferred oversight of candidates' partisan affiliations to the IEC, but it has been criticized for maintaining vague language that allows for arbitrary restrictions on the parties overall. Some party leaders and members are subject to harassment by officials including travel bans, summons by the security officials, and denials of legal document renewals.

The political system—including the overrepresentation of rural voters—limits the ability of any party-based opposition to make significant gains. The IAF and its allies in the Islah Alliance, won a combined 8.7 percent of lower-house seats in the 2020 election. Moreover, the constitutional authority of the monarchy means that no opposition force can win control of the executive branch by democratic means alone.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

While voters and candidates are generally free from overt threats or violence, they remain heavily influenced by tribal affiliations and the state-sponsored patronage networks that accompany them. The Jordanian intelligence service is widely believed to influence the electoral process. Citizens' political participation is also constrained by the fact that many important positions are appointed rather than elected.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women have equal political rights, and women candidates have seats beyond the legal quotas set for the parliament and subnational councils, but cultural prejudices remain an obstacle to their full participation in practice. No women won parliamentary seats beyond the 15-seat quota in the 2020 poll. Women won 27 percent of all municipal, governorate, and Amman municipality council seats in the 2022 local elections.

Nine lower-house seats are reserved for Christians, and three are reserved for ethnic Circassians and Chechens together. Christians are not permitted to contest unreserved seats. Citizens of Palestinian origin, who tend to live in urban areas, make up most of the overall population but remain politically underrepresented.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The king dominates policymaking and the legislative process. Though the appointed government or groups of 10 or more lawmakers can propose legislation to the House of Representatives—which may approve, reject, or amend bills—every law requires approval from the appointed Senate and the king to become law. Among other royal prerogatives, the king unilaterally appoints the heads of the armed forces, the intelligence service, and the gendarmerie.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

The government has undertaken some efforts to combat widespread corruption, and the Integrity and Anti-Corruption Commission (IACC) is tasked with investigating allegations. However, successful prosecutions—particularly of high-ranking officials—are historically rare. Anticorruption efforts are undermined by a lack of genuinely independent enforcement institutions and restrictions on investigative journalism and civil society activism.

In June 2020, the government cracked down on businesspeople and politicians suspected of tax evasion, money laundering, and customs evasion after expanding the IACC's powers. By July of that year, authorities had raided 650 firms and were reportedly examining the tax records of 70 individuals. While Jordanians cautiously welcomed the crackdown, observers warned that political opponents were also being targeted by the government. January 2022 constitutional amendments prohibit parliamentarians from obtaining state contracts through companies they own, directly or indirectly.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Access-to-information laws are vague, lack procedural detail, and contain sweeping exceptions. Officials are not required to make public declarations of their income and assets. The National Assembly does not exercise effective or independent oversight of the government's budget proposals. Activists and journalists who attempt to investigate state or royal finances are subject to arrest on defamation and other charges.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 22 / 60 (−1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Jordanian media laws are restrictive, vague, and arbitrarily enforced. Various statutes penalize defamation, criticism of the king or state institutions, harming Jordan's relations with foreign states, blasphemy, and any content considered to lack objectivity. Authorities appoint the editors and control the finances of several media outlets. Government gag orders and informal instructions to editors regarding news coverage are common, and journalists are routinely arrested for violating such orders. News sites face onerous registration requirements that, if not met, can serve as a justification for blocking. Journalists rarely face serious violence or significant jail time for their work, but they often practice self-censorship.

In 2022, journalists were harassed or arrested repeatedly for reporting on a variety of topics that the regime deems taboo. Family members and friends of reporters who challenge the regime have been reportedly threatened with loss of employment and difficulties renewing work visas or other official documents.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Islam is the state religion. The government monitors sermons at mosques for political, sectarian, or extremist content and issues prescribed texts and themes. Muslim clerics require government authorization to preach or dispense religious guidance. Many Christian groups are recognized as religious denominations or associations and can worship freely, though they cannot proselytize among Muslims. While converts from Islam are not prosecuted for apostasy, they face bureaucratic obstacles and harassment in practice. Unrecognized religious groups are allowed to practice their faiths but face disadvantages stemming from their lack of legal status. Atheists and agnostics are required to list a religious affiliation on government documents. The king appoints the country's Grand Mufti.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Intelligence services reportedly monitor academic events and campus life, and administrators work with state officials to scrutinize scholarly material for politically sensitive content.

Open discussion of politics, the monarchy, religious affairs, and security issues is inhibited by the threat of punishment under various laws governing expression. The telecommunications law requires companies to enable the tracking of private communications upon the issuance of a court order, and authorities are allowed to order surveillance of people suspected of terrorism. Many Jordanians believe that government agents routinely listen to their phone calls and monitor their online activities. Jordan's Cybercrime Law, the Crime Prevention Law, and the penal code allow officials to detain citizens at will.

Under cybercrime legislation, internet users can face fines or prison terms of up to three months if they are convicted of defamation for online comments. Human Right Watch investigated 30 cases between 2019 and 2022 in which activists and protesters were arrested and charged with defamation related to social media posts or views expressed in public gatherings. Pegasus spyware, created by the Israeli company NSO Group, was reportedly used to hack the phones of four human rights activists, lawyers, and journalists from 2019 through 2021; Jordanian government agencies are suspected of being behind these attacks.

Restrictions on other social media apps, some permanent, are common. Following violence at protests in December 2022, authorities suspended the social media platform TikTok.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Jordanian law limits free assembly. Authorities require prior notification for any demonstration or event and have broad discretion to disperse public gatherings. The Ministry of the Interior has canceled planned public events without advance notice or explanation.

Violations of the law on assembly can draw fines and jail time. Security forces are known to engage in violent confrontations with protesters.

In March and April 2022, hundreds of journalists, politicians, and activists involved in the country's Hirak were arrested under vague stipulations in the penal code and the Cybercrime Prevention Law. Authorities carried out the arrests to prevent widespread antigovernment demonstrations and sit-ins planned to protest government corruption and the dissolution of the Teachers' Syndicate, as well as to commemorate the 2011 protest movement. Widespread protests against rising fuel prices and the cost-of-living crisis also occurred in December. Rioters and other violent actors were present during the demonstrations, and their actions resulted in the death of a police officer.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

While many local and international NGOs can operate in the country, there are significant restrictions on civil society. The Ministry of Social Development has broad supervisory powers over NGO operations, has the authority to deny registration and requests for foreign funding, and can disband organizations it finds objectionable. Board members of NGOs must be vetted by state security officials. In practice, these regulations are applied in an opaque and arbitrary manner.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Workers have the right to form unions, but only in 17 designated industries; no new union has formed since 1976. Groups must obtain government approval and join the country's semiofficial union federation, the General Federation of Jordanian Trade Unions (GFJTU). The right to strike is limited by requirements for advance notice and mediation, and participants in an illegal strike are subject to dismissal.

In 2013, a dozen unofficial trade unions formed the Jordanian Federation of Independent Trade Unions (JFITU). Lacking official status, they are not allowed to establish headquarters, collect fees from their members, or engage in collective bargaining. They also face heavy pressure from the GFJTU and government bodies to cease their activities and shut down.
